The Institution of Christian Religion, written in Latine by M. John Caluine, and translated into English according to the Authors last edition, with sundry Tables to finde the principall matters entreated of in this booke, and also the declaration of places of Scripture therein expounded, by Thomas Norton.

Whereunto there are newly added in the margent of the booke, notes conteyning in briefe the substance of the matter handled in each section.

A.D. MDLXXXVII.
Ood Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English, M. Calvin's book of the institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Calvin first wrote it when he was a young man, a booke of small volume, and since that season he hath at sundrie times published it with newe encreases, still protesting at every edition him selfe to bee one of those qui scribendo proficiant, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing doe growe in profiting, and with their profiting doe proceede in writing. At length having in many his other workes travailed about expositon of sundry bookes of the Scriptures, and in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him and not in any other Methode, were not so ready for the readers vse, hee therefore entred into this purpose to enlarge this booke of Institutions, and therin to treat of all those titles and common places largely, with this intent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other booke to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplifie his bookees of commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholely to this storehouse and treasure of that sort of divine learning. As age and weakeneffe grewe vpon him, so hee hasted his labour, and according to his petition to God, he in manner ended his life with his workes, for he lived not long after. So great aiewell was meete to be made most beneficiall that is to say, applied to most common vse. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queenes maiesties most blessed reign, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deere friends of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitchurch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, & Latine tongues the other her higheenes printer of the booke of common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my said friend Ed: Whitchurch, a man well knowne of vpright heart and dealing an auncient zealous Godpeller, as plaine and true a friend as euer I knewe living, and as desirous to doe any thing to common good, specially by the advancement of true religion. At my saied first edition of this booke, I considered howe the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plentie of matter in small rime of wordes, yea and those so circumpectly and precisely ordered, to avoid the caulisations of such, as for enmitie to the truth therein conteyned, would gladly seekke & abuse all advantages which might be found by any oversift in penning of it, that the sentences were therby become so ful as nothing nothing might well be added without idle superfluity, and againe so nicely pared that nothing could be diminished without taking away some necessary substance of matter therein expressed. This manner of writing, beside the peculiar termines of artes and figures, and the difficulty of the matters themselves, being throughout inreplaced with the schoolens contreversies, made a great hardness in the authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and easie, in so much that it sufficeth not to reade him once, unless you can be content to reade in vain. This consideration encombered me with great doubtfulnesse for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I sawe that of necessity the hardness in the translation must needs be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I should leave the course of words, and grant my self liberty after the natural manner of my owne tongue, to say that in English which I conceived to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceived howe hardly I might escape error, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, howe perilous it was to erre. For I durft not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his words. And they that wrote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, do know that not the onely grammatical construction of words sufficeth, but the very building & order to observer all advantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of wordes, maketh much to the true setting forth of a writers minde. In the ende, I rested upon this determination, to followe the words so neere as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer mee. Which purpose I so perfourmed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it should not exceede the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefite is more ouer provided, for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be wished in many of thole men for whose profession this booke most fitly served) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such fewe places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnish themselves with understanding of that speache, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not onely trust mine owne wit or ability, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence throughout the whole booke with conference and overlooking of such learned mens as my translation being allowed by their judgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truely, and their approving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be delivered him but sound, unmingled, and uncorrupted doctrine, even in such sort as the author himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the grave, learned, and vertuous man M. David Whitehed (whome I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining every sentence throughout the whole booke. Beside all this, I privately required many and generally all men with whom I euer had any talke of this matter, that that if they found any thing either not truely translated, or not plainly Englished, they would ensorme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amend it. Since which time I have not bene aduertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied any leasure to persue it. And that is the cause, why not onely at the second and thirde time but also at this impression, you have no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In deed I perceived many men well minded and studious of this booke, to require a table for their eafe and furtherance. Their honest desire I have fulfilled in the second edition, and have added thereto a plentiful table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters discoursed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and under euery title is set forth a briefe summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the booke, Chapter, and Section or division of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and proued. And for the reader finding thereof, I haue caused the number of the Chapters to bee set upon every leaf in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsual figures in Algorisme. And now at this last publishing, my friends by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romane letter and smaller volume, with divers e other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefit. Moreover, whereas in the first edition the cuill maner of my scribling hand, the enterlining of my Copy, and some other causes well known among workemen of that faculty, made very many faults to paff the Printer, I have in the second impression caused the booke to be compos'd by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needs be that it was much more truely done than the other was, as I my selfe doe knowe above three hundred faults amended. And nowe at this last Printing, the composing after a printed copy bringeth some ease, & the diligece vsed about the correction, having bene right faithfully looked vnto, it canot be but much more truly set forth. This alio is performed, the volume being smaller, with a letter faire & legible, it is of more eafe price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the printers behalfe and mine, your eafe and commoditie (good Readers) is provided for. Nowe resteth your owne diligence for your owne profit in studying it. To spend many wordes in commending the worke it selfe, were needless: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vtntruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men haue written booke's of common places of our religion, as Melanchton, Sarviius, and other, whose worke are verie good and profitable to the Church of God; yet by the consenting judgement of those that understand the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Calwihn, both for his substantiall sufficiencie of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most depe and strong confutation of all olde and newe heresies: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable booke for all students of Chriftian diuinitie. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefite, that you may haue this profite of my trauel, so I befeech you let me haue this vfe of your gentleness, that my doings may be construed to such good end as I haue meant them: and that if any thing mislike you by reason of hardnesse, or any other cause that may seeme to be my deault, you wil not forthwith condemne the work, but read it oftener in which doing you will finde (as many haue confessed to me that they haue found by experience) that those things which at the first reading shall displease you for hardnesse, shall be found so easie as so hard matter would suffer, and for the most part more easie than some other phrase which should with greater loosenesse and smoother sliding away deceive your understanding. I confesse indeede it is not finely and pleasantly written, nor carrieth with it such delitiesfull grace of speech as some great wise men haue bestowed vpon some foolisher things, yet it containeth found truth above saith with faithfull plainnesse without wrong done to the authors meaning: and so if you accept and vse it, you shal not faile to haue great profit thereby, and I shall thinke my labour verie well imploied.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE FRANCISCE

THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his foueraigne Lord, John Caluine witheth peace and sal-uation in Christ.

When I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble King) than to write anie thing that afterward should be presented to your maiestie. One lie my mind was to teach certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeal of religion might be instructed to true godlines. And this trauaile I tooke principallie for my contemne the Frenchmen, of whom I understand very manie so hunger & thirst for Christ, but I saw veere few that had rightlie received so much as anie little knowledge of him. And that this was my meaning, the booke it selfe declared, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceive-ed, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre prevailed in your realme, that in it there is no room for solid doctrine: I thought I should do a thing worth my trauaile, all in one worke both to give an instruction for them, and to declare a confesstion to you: whereby ye may learn what maner of doctrine that is against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sword & fire.
For I will not fear to confess, that I have in this worke comprehended in manner the summe of that same doctrine against which they cry out, that is ought to be puniished with prisonment, banishment, condemnation without judgement, and with fire, that is ought to be chased awaye by land and sea. I knowe in deedie with howe hainous informations they have filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most basefull unto you: but this of your clemencie ought you so weight, that there shalbe no innocence, neither in wordes nor deeds, if it may be enough to accuse. Truelie if anie, to bring the same in hairedd shall allege that this doctrine whereof I nowe go about to yeedle account unto you, hath bene long ago condemned by consent of all degrees, and attainted by manie judgements already given in judicial courts, at that he faileth that amount to no more but that is hath partlie bin violentlie thrown downe by the banding & power of the adversaries thereof, & partlie bin traiterouslie & fraudulently oppressed with their lies and futile practises & slaides. Herein is violence, shewed that without hearing the cause, bloody sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraud, that is without deserties accused of sedition & evil doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfullie coplaie of these thinges, you your selfe can beare us witness, most noble king, by how lying flanders it is daily accused unto you: as that is tendeth to no other ende but to with from kings their scepters of their handes, to throwe downe all judgges fletters and judgments, so subuerse all orders and civil governments, so trouble the peace and quiet of the people, so abolis all Lawes, so unde all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things upside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthlie judge it with the maintainers thereof, wondrous of a thousand fiers and gallowes.
Who can now maruell that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleived? Lo, this is the case that all degrees agree & conspire to the condemning of us of our doctrine. They that set us judge, being punished with this affection pronounced for sensées their foreconceived determinations which they brought from home with them: and think that they have well enough discharged their duties, if they command no man to be drawn to execution but such as are found guilty either by their own confession or by sufficient witnisse. But of what fault doth that condemned doctrine say they. But by what law condemned? Herein should have stand the succours of defence for them, not to deny the doctrine is false, but to maintain it for true. But here is all libertie once to mutter, utterly cut off from us.

Wherefore I do not unjustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your own hand the whole hearing of the cause which bisherto hath been troublesome handled or rather carelessly tossed without all order of law, more by ouragiouts beate than indigall gravatie. Neither yet thinkes, that I here goe about to make mine owne private defense, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrie, to which although I bear such affection of natural love as becommeth me yet as the case now is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take upon mee the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which as this day having bene by all means serue & troden done in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that in deed rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharisies than by you owne knowlledge. But bow that cometh to passe, it is not here needful to tell; truly it lieth in great disfres. For thus farre have the ungodly prevailed, that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet is lieth hidden as buried and un-regarded, as for the silly poore Church, it is either wasted with cruel slaughters, and so driven away with banishments, or dismayed with threats and terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage & fiercenes as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending and the rvine which themselves have made. In the meane time no man feareth forth to set him selfe in defense against such furious. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to favour she truthe, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and unskilfulness of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and unskilfulness which they know to be the most certaine truth of God. Calling them ignorant, where with it they see that Christ hath not so despised but that he hath vouch cazed to communicate to them the mysteries of his heavenly wisdome. So much are all ashamed of the Gospell. It shall be your office (most noble King) not to turne away your eares nor your minde from it as a defense: specially when so great a matter is in question: namelie how the glorie of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the truth of God may kepe her honor, how Christ may have his kingdome preferred whole among vs. This is a matter worthie for your eares, worthy for your judgement, worthy for your royal thron. For, even this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge him selfe in the governance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now use a kingdome but a robberie, which reigneth not to this end that he may servie the glorie of God. And he is deceived that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdome, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holy word: forasmuch as the heavenly Oracle cannot prove vained, whereby it is proclaimed, that she people shall be scattered abroad where prophesie failles. Neither ought she contempt of our basenesse to wished away vs from this purpose. We verily knowe right well, howe poore and abject silly men wee bee, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrementes and outcastes of the world, or whatsoever viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for us to glory upon before God, but his only mercie whereby we are without any our deserving received into the hope of eternal salvation: and before men, nothing but our weaknesses, which among them is taken for a most great shame to confesse so much as in conuenience. But our doctrine must be advanced up above all glorie of the world, must stand unaniquifiable above all power; because it is not ours; but the doctrine of the living God and of his Chrift, whom the Father hath appointed king to bear rule even from sea to sea, and from the viners even to the ends of the earth: and so to bear rule, that striking the whole earth with the onely rod of his mouth, he may break it with all the iron and brazen strength, with all the golden and filver glistening thereof, as it were poers welfels; as the prophete prophecie of the roialtie of his kingdom. Our adversaries in deede do criue out to the contrarie, and say that we falsly presente the worde of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not onely a malicious fclaunder, but also a notable fhamelesnes, you your selfe by reading our confifion, may according to your wifedome judge. Yet here it is also good to say somewhat, either to move you to willingeffe and heefedifffe, or at the leaft to prepare you a way to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all prophetic to be framed so to the agreeableness of ffaith, hath fett a fower rule whereby the exponding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is alreadie in our hands. For what doth better or more ffitlie agree with faith, than to acknowledge ourselves naked of all vnterreffe, that of God we may be clothed emptie of al good, that of him we may be filled? the bondfervans of Sin, that of him we may be made free; blind that of him we may be enightened; lame, that of him we may be made ftreight; feeble, that of him we may be upheld to take from our falues at matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious onhie, & in him vve may glory? When we fay these & fuch like things, they interrupt us & criue out, that by this meanes is overthrown if vve are not what blinde light of nature, fained preparations, free will, workes meritorious of eternal salvation, together with their Supererogations: because they cannot abide that the vwhole praise and glorie of all goodnes, vnterreffe, righteousnes, and wifedome should remaine in God. But vve read not that they were blamed that have drawn too much out of the fountain of living water: on the contrarie fide they are sharply rebuked which have digged to themselves pits, broken pittes, which are not able to holde vveater. Again, what is more agreeable with ffaith, than to promife to ourselves that God will be to them a favourable Father, wherefo Chrift is acknowledged to be a brother and procuer of favour: than aswedely to looke for all things joyful and prosperous as his hand, vhoes unfpeakable love towards us hath proceeded fo farre, that he hath not pained his onely begotten Sonne, but that he gave him for vve: than him to refi in sure looking for salvation & eternal life, vhere vve thinke vpon Chrift given of the Father, in whom such treafures are hidden? Here they fteppe in against vs, and criue out that this certaintie of affiance is not without arrogancie & prefumption. But as nothing of our falues, fo all things ought vve to promife of God: and vve are for none other reaon spoiled of vaine glorie, but that vve should learn to glorie in the Lorde. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the parts of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kinde of wicked men, unless you plainly finde that vve are in trouble and railed at, because vve put our trust in the living God: because vve believe that this is the eternal life, so know vve one true God, and him vhoome he hath fent Jesus Chrift. For this hope some of us are bounde in irons, some are whipped, some are carried about in mockage some are condemned without judgement, some are most cruelly torment, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terribly accursed, some with flanders, and handled in most heinous wise. Now look upon our adversaries (as I speak of the degree of Priests, at whose becke and will the other exercise enowmy against us) and consider with me a little while, with what zeal they are carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the scriptures, and which ought to be holden certaine among all men, they easlie gaine leave both to themselves and other to be ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they thinke that it makes the small matter what everie man beleue or not beleue concerning God and Christ; so that he be do with an unexpressed faith (as they call it) submits his mind to the judgement of the Church; neither are they much moved, if it happen that the glorie of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift up his finger against the supremacy of the Apostolike sea, and authoritie of our holy mother the Church. Why therefore doe they wish so great crueltie and fierennesse fight for the Masse, Purgatory, Pilgrimages, and such trifles, so farre forth, that they say that without moiste expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godliness can not stand, whereas yet they proue not that any of these things come out of the word of God: Why so, but because their belly is their God, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them do plentifully glut themselves, and other some line with gnawing of poor cruelties, yet they line all of one Pot, which without these warming helps should not onely waxe colde, but also throughly freeze. Therefore how much more euerie of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrier he is for their faith. Finallie they all endeavour themselves to this, to keepe still either both kingdom safe, and their bellie full: but of pure scule none of them showeth anie token, be it never so little. Neithers yet doe they cease to slander our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suppiotion. They call it newe, and lately forged: they caull that it is doubtfull, and uncertaine they demande by what miracles it is confirmed: they ask whether it be mette that it should prevaine against the content of so many holy fathers, and the most ancient cuosome: they pressse upon us to confesse it to be schismatical, which moveth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien deade in manie ages in which no such thing hath bene heard of. Last of all they saie that there need no argument, for (sai they) it maie by the fruits be judged of what for it is, namelie which hath bred so hauie a heape of sects, so manie heretics of seditions, so great licentiousnes of vices. Truelie full easie it is for them, to triumph upon a forskwen cause before the light becomimg, so ignorant multitude. But if we might also have our turne like wise allowed us to speake veriitie this sharp heat would soone be cooled wherein they do so wish ful mouth & as licentiouslie as unpunishedly some against vs.

First, whereas they caille is newe, they do great wrong to God, whose holy wordes delivered not to be accused of newnesse. To them in dede I nothing doubt that it is newe, to whom Christes is newe, & his Gospell is newe. But they which kneve that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Jesus Christ died for our sinneres, and rose again for our justification, shall finde nothing new among us. Whereas it hath long been hidden unknown, and buried: that is the fault of the ungodliness of men. Now Sith it is by the bountifullnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution of receit againe the title of ancienitie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take it for doubt-
To the French king.

This verity is which the Lord by his prophet complained, that the axe knewe his owner, and the axe his masters fell, but his people knew him not. But howeuer they mocke the uncertainty is: if they were driven to seal their owne doctrine with their owne bloud, & with losse of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our assiance, which redeemeth neither the terror of death, nor yet the very judgement state of God.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale unreasonably with vs. For we come nowe to the second Gospell, but bolds fast the same Gospell for confirming of the truth whereof all the miracles do serve that ever Christ and his Apostles have done. But this thing they have speciall above us, that they can even to this day confirme their faith with continual miracles. Yeu rather they alledge miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwise wondr stabilld; they are either trifling and worthy to be laught at, or vain & lying. And yet, although they were never so monstrous, they ought not to have ben of any value against the worde of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in enuie place & at enuie time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by naturall order of things. This false colour might peradventure have made the better shew for the Scripture did not informe us of the lawfull end and use of miracles. For, Mark teacheth that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it. Likewise Luke also saith that the Lord did beare witness to the worde of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the handes of the Apostles. Wherein wholly agree that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospel was preached, salvation was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare witness to it with signes, and wonders, and divers powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospel, that we turne to the destroying of the credit of the Gospell: those things which are appointed onely to stablish the truth, that we apply to confirming of lies? Therefore it is neede that the doctrine, which (as the Evangelists faith) goeth before miracles, bee first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the mark, if it tende not to the seeking of the glory of men, but of God. Sith Christ affirmeth this to be the proofe of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully esteemed which are drawn to any other ende than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Sathan hath his miracles, which although they bee ingling deceites rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceive the ignorant & unskilful. Magicians & enchanters have bin alwaies famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles have nourished idolatrie: which yet do not prove so to vs, that the superstition of Magicians & idolaters is lawful. And with this battering ramme in old time the Donatists did make the simplicitie of the cemen people for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we do nowe make the same answer to our adversaries, which Augustyne then made to the Donatistes: that he Lord hath made vs wero agains such miracle workers, when he foretold that there should come false prophets, which with lying signes & divers wonders, should if it were possible bring the elect into error. And Paul hath given warning that the kingdom of Antichrist should be with all power, & signes, & lying wonders. But these miracles (say they) are done not of idols, nor of forcers, but of false prophets, but of the Saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of Satan, to transfigure himself into an angel of light. In old time the Egyptians worshipped Jeremey which was buried among the with sacrifices & other divine honors. Did not they abuse the holy prophets of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tomb, they obtained that they thought he healing of the singing of the few pents to be the just reward of God. What shall we say but that this has been and ever shall be the most just vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to such that have not received the love of truth, that they may be led to lying. Therefore we want not miracles, and those certain, and not subject to cavillations. As for miracles which they bring forth for themselves, they are mere illusions of Satan, for as much as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanity.

Moreover, they do slanderous lies set the Fathers against us (I mean the ancients Fathers & the writers of the age as yet more uncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of their ungodliness, whose authority if the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victorie (so speake even most modestly) would be bende to our side. But whereas many things have beene excellent, well and wisely written of those Fathers, & in some things that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good natural children forsooth, according to the rightness that they have, both of wit, judgment, and minde: doe worship onely their faults and errors: and those things which are well spoken, they either marke not, or feeme as if they knew them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gold of the Fathers. Then they oppose us with impertinent crying out against us, as defiers and enemies of the Fathers. But wee doe so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easilie prove by their contentious voices, the greater part of these things, that we say at this date. But we so read their writings, that we alwaie remember, that all things are ours, to serve us, not to have dominion over us: and that we are Christes alone, whom wee must obie in all things without exception. Wherefore keepes not this choice, shall have nothing cermaine in Religion: for as much as those boyle men were ignorant of many things, do frequentely strive one with another, and sometime fight with themselves. Not without cause (saie they) we are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the old boylde which our Fathers have set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fields, and the obedience of Faith, which ought so bee so framed that it forgets her people and the house of her father. If they have so great delight to use allegories, why doe they not rather expound the Apostles, than any other, to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds is not lawful to plucke up? for so did Hierome expound it, whose words have registred among their Canons. But if they will have the bounds of the same fathers, whom they meane, so be stedfastlie kept: why do they so off as they lift, so licentiousely passe them? Of the number of the fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateeth not, nor drinkest, & that therefore he needeth neither cup nor dishes: the other said, that the holy things require not gold, & that those things please not with gold, which are not bought with gold. Therefore they passe the bound, which are in the boyle things so much delighted with golde, silver, jewel, marble, precious stones and flkes: and thinke that God is not rightlie worshipped, unlesse altogether they bee dissolved & set out with exquisite gorgeous, or rather with outrageous exesse. A Father was hee, which said, that he therefore did freeli case flesh on the day in which other abstained, because hee was a Christian. Therefore they passe the bounders, when they accuse the sole hee eateeth flesh in lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said that a Monk which laboured not with his handes, is judged as wilfull as a violent racker: or (if you will) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawful for monks to live of other mens good, although they be continuallie busied in contemplations: in prayers, in studie. This bound also they have past, when they placed the idle & barrell bellies of Monks in stews & brothelhous

... be fasting with other men substance. A Father was he, which said, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any saint, in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiastical Council, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on walls. They are farre from holding themselves within these bounds, when they leave one corner without images. An other Father counselled, that having done the duty of naturall kindness towarde the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These bounds they brake, when they cast into men a continual carefullnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testifieth that the substance of bread and wine in the sacrament of the supper remaineth, and ceaseth not, as in the Lord: Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man, joined with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which faie that after the words of the Lord rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth; that it may be transferred into his body and blood. Fathers were they which as they entered to the whole Church but one sacrament of Thanksgiving, and as they debarred from it wicked and bainous wittles: so did greenously condemn all those which being present, did not communicate of it. Howe farre have they removed those bounds, when they fill not only Churches, but also private houses with their masters, and admist all men to looke upon them, and every man so much more gladly as hee more largely payeth, howe uncleane and wicked so ever they be: but allure no man to faith in Christ and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: ye rather doe boastfully seat out to sale their owne works for the grace and merits of Christ? Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should be altogether debarred from the use of the Holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the same, abstained from the other. And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the Christian people the blood of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commanded to shedd their owne blood. These bounds also they have taken away, when they base by an immovable law commanded the selfe same thing which the one of these Fathers punisht with excommunication, and the other reproved with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it is to be rashnes to determine any thing of a doubtful matter on the one side or the other, without cleare and evident testimonies of the Scripture. This bound they forgott, when they established so many confusions, so many canons, so many majestically determinations, without any word of God. A father was he, which among other heresies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lavers of fastings. This bound also they have farre passed, when they commanded fasting with most straight lavers. A father was he, which denied that marriage ought to be forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a man lying with his owne wife to be chastity: and fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritie. Beyond these bounds have they gone, when they severely enjoyned unmarried life to their sacrifiers. A Father was he which judgeth, that only Christ ought to be heard, of whom it is said, Heare him: and that we ought not to have regard, what other men which were before us have saide or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commanded. This bound neither do they appoint to themselves, nor do suffer other to have it appointed them, when they set both other themselves and other any mazier whatsoever they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that the Church ought not to set it selfe before Christ, because hee alwayes judgeth truly: but the judges of the Church, or men, are commonly deceived. They breaking through this bound also, sicke not to affirm that the whole authoritie of the Scripture hangeth upon the word—

awardment of the church. All the Fathers have with one heart accused, and with one mouth pronounced, is abominable, that the holie Word of God should bee entangled with the subtleties of Sophisters, and brawling of Logicians. Doe they holde themselves within those boundes, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but with endless strifes, and more than sophistical babblings to wrappe and encomber the simplicitie of the Scriptures so that if the fathers were nowe rais'd to life again, and should heare such an art of brawling, which these men call Speculative Divinitie, they would beleeme that nothing lesse is done than anie dissuasion had of God. But my tale should Iread is set beyond due bounds, if I would reckon up how boldlie these men shake the yoke of the Father, whose obedient children they would seeme to bee. Truelie both moneths and yeares would bee too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we stike not to passe the annient bounds.

But now whereas they call us to custome, they nothing prevail. For wee should be most unstrofefulie dealt with, if we should be driven to yedd so custome. Truelie if the judgements of men were right, Custome should be taken of the good. But is oftimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is scene to bee done of manie, by and by obtineth the right of a Custome. But the state of men hath scarcellie at any time beene in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the primate vices of manie hath beene made a publike error, or rather a common consent of vices, which now these good men would have to stand for a law. Who so have eyes do see that not onelie one sea of euilles hath overflowed, many poisonous pellisences have invaded the worlde, that all thinges runne headlong to ruines so that either the matters of men must be utterlie despaired, or we must lay hand unto, or rather use violence upon so great euiles. And remedie is by no other reason driven away, but because we have now long time accustomed us to euilles. But bee it that publike error have place in matters of common weale: yet in the kindome of God his onelie truith is to be heard and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeares, by no custome, by no conspired agreement may any prescription be limited. So in olde time Elay taught the elect of God, that they should not say Conspiring, to all thinges in which the people said Conspiring: that is to say, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should fear and dread the people's fear: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lorde of hosts, and he should be their fear and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list object against us both pased and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lorde of hosts, we will not bee much afraid. For whether is it bee that many ages have confessed to like ungodinesse, hee is strong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole worlde together conspire into one selfe same wickednoise, hee hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with the multitude, when hee did with a general overthrowing destroy the whole kindes of men, preferring Noe with a small householder, which should be by his faith beeing but one man condemne the whole worlde. Finallie an euill custome, is none other than a common pellisence, in which they doe nevertheless die that die with companie of a multitude. Moreover they ought to have considered thes which Cyprian faith in certaine places; that they which sinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselves from all fault, yet may seeme after some manner excusable: but who so obstinately refuse the truth offered by the grace of God, they have nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they do not drive us to so hard a fright with it, to compel us to confesse, that either the Church hath line dead a certaine time, or that we have controversie against the Church. True, the Church of Christ hath linned and shall linned, so long as Christ shall reign at the right hand of the Father: by whose hands she is upheld, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safe-tie. For hee will undoubtedly performe that which he hath once promised, that he will bee present with his even until the ending of the world. Against it now wee have no more at all. For we do wish one confesse together with all the people of the faithfull honor and worship the one God and Christ the Lord, in like sort as he hath always beene worshipped of all the godlie. But they themselves not a little way err from the truth, when they acknowledge no Church, but which they see with present eie, and go about to compose it about with those boundes in which it is not enclosed. Upon these points hangeth our controversie: first that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appeaing and to bee seene: then, that they see the same forme in the see of the Church of Rome, and in the order of their prelates. Wee on the contrary side affirme, both that the Church may consist of no appeaing forme, and that the forme of selfe is not contained in that outward shining shew, which they foolishlie have in admiration, but hath a far other mark, namely the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministration of sacraments. They are in a rage, unlesse the church may be already pointed out with a finger. But how ofis happened it is in the people of the Iewes to bee so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme think we to have shined, when Helias, one of Kinges, 19.12. bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the comming of Christ hath it been hidde without forme? How since that time hath it been oppressed with wars, seditions, and hresies, that it shined on no side? If they had linned at that time, would they have beleewed that there was any church? But it was said to Helias, that there were preferred seue thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought to be doubted to us, but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heaven. But if the godly had then sought any discernable form with their eyes, shold they not by & by have bin discouraged. And verily Hylaric accounted is even alreadie in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of byshops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking under that visor. For thus he saith: One thing I warn you, beware of antichrist: for you are ill taken with the lose of wall: ye do ill worship the church of God in houses & buildings: under them ye do ill thrust in the name of peace. It is doubtful that in those Antichrist shal se Mounaines & woods & lakes, & prisons, & causes are after me. For in these the prophets, when they were either abiding or shrowed into them, did prophesie. But what dou the worldd at this day hauo in his hornd byshops, but that is thinketh them to be hauie prelates of a religion, whom heis seeth to bee heads over great Citie? Away therefore vth such foolish adorning. But rather let vs leave this to the Lordes, for as much as hee alone knoweth who bee his, and sometim bee taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I grant) a horrible vengeance of God upon the earth. But if the wickednesse of men doe suruere, why doe we secke to with-stande the just vengeance of GOD? In such wise the Lord hath in times past taken vengeance of the unthankfulnesse of men. For because they would not receive his truth, and had quenched his light, bee suffered them being blinded in sense, both to bee mocked with lies full of al-lyrie, and so bee drowned in deep darkeesse, so that there was no face of the true Church to be seene.

Yes
The Preface,

Yet in the mean time he saw his both being scattered abroad and lying hidden in the midst of errors and darkness from destruction, and now a man. For he can skill to save both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning oven. But whereas they would have the name of the church to be judged by if it were not what vain pompous show: how perilous that is, I will rather point unto than declare. Least I should draw out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolical see, and the Bishops that are anointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and mitres, do represent the church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot err. How so? because they are pastors of the church, and consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israel also pastors? But Aaron and his sons after that they were made priests, did yet err when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the five hundred Prophets, which lied to Ahab, have represented the Church? But the Church was on Micaehas side, being indece but one man alone, and unregarded, but out of whose mouths came truth. Did not the false Prophets in resemblance bear both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise up against Jeremy, and wish threatening boasted that it was not possible that the law should perish from the priest, countless from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Jeremy alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophets, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the law should perish from the Priest, countless from the wiseman, and the words from the Prophet. Did not such a glistening shew shine in that Counsell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sike fast in the outward visour, that they may make Christ and all the prophets of God, schismatics; and on the other side make the minifiers of Satan, the instruments of the holy ghost, if they beake as they thinke, let them falselie answer me, in what nation or place they think that the Church remained since the time that by the decree of the Counsell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and deposed from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the Counsell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawful, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him pratisied the dissolution of the Counsell. Yet afterward being borne up by the favour of Princes, he recovered his popacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had beene orderly made by the authorisie of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: saying that hee himselfe was appeas with a Cardinall, hat, as it were a barking dog with a pece of bread cast unto him. Out of the boome of these heretikes, rebellers, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbes and priests that have beene since. Here they are taken and can noe goe no further. For, whether side will they give the name of the Church? will they deny that the counsell was general, which wanne nothing to the outward majestie: nameing, which being solemnly summoned by two bullers, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same digniter in the last end? Will they confess Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the church, or they all as manie as are of them shall be of us accounted schismatikes, which wittingly and willingly have beene ordered to heresikes. If it had never before been knowne, that the church is not esous to outward pompes, they themselves may bee so
To the French King.

A large proofe, which under that glorious title of the Church have so long so proudly boasted themselves, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragical doings wherewith their whole life swarmed full, because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leisure to read our writing, you shall plainly know that the very doctrine, the doctrine is felfe, for the which they say that they be the church is a deadly butcherie of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally they doe not uprightness enough, when they doe spitefully rebeare howe great troubles, upproes, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawn with in, or what fruiue is now beareth in many. For the blame of these evils is unworthye laid upon it which ought rather to haue bin imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall propertie of the worde of God, that whensoever it riesth upp, Satan is never quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most truрафie mark, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easie showe forth themselves when they are received with favorable eares of all men, and are heard of the world rejoicing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all thinges were drowned in deepes darkenesse, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manuer of all men, and lay idle and sooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sounde peace. For what should he else doe but laugh and plaie being in quiet and peaceable possesion of his kingdom? But when the lights shinning from above somewhat scattered abroad his darkness, he that strong maketh troubled and affailed his kingdom, then he began to shake off his wonted drowsinesse, and hastilie to arme himselfe. Andfirst he stirr'd up the force of men, wherby he might violently oppresse the truth beginning to shone. By which when he nothing premained, he turned to subtile entrapings. He stirr'd up contentions and dissaenctions of doctrines by his Catholickes, and other monstrous lewde men, whereby he might darken it and as length utterly quench it. And now he continueth to asseale it is with both engines. For he traveleth both by the force and power of men to plucke up that seeds: and with his darrell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and bear fruit. But all this he doth in vain, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his crafte unto us, that he should not take us unware, and hath armed us with sufficient defences against all his engines. But howe great maliciousnes is it to lay upon the worde of God, the hatred either of the seditious, which naughty rebellious men doe stirre vp, or of the fables which deceivers doe raise against it? Yes it is no newe example. Elia was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Jewes a seditious man. The Apostles were accused of making a commotion among the people. What other thing doe they which at this date do raise upon us all the troubles, upproes and contentions that boile up against us? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught us: namelie that it is not we that scatter errors: or stirre vp upproes: but it is they themselves that wrestle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beare backe their rashnesse, soo againe we ought to meete with the weaknesses of another, who oftentimes happen to be mov'd with such offences, and in their dismaying so waver. But let them, so the end that they may not faint with this dismayning and be discouraged, knowe that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same thinges that nowe happen unto us. There were unlearned and unstedfast men, which wreset to their owne destruction, those thinges that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith, There were despisers of God, which when they heard his name abounded.
to the end that grace might more abound, by and by obsetted. Wee will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When we heard that this faithfull are not under the lawe, they by and by answered, Wee will then sinne, because we are not under the lawe, but under grace. There were that accused him as an exhortor to evil. There entered prylly many false Apostles to destroy the churches which he had builded. Some by envy & contention, and not purelye, and maliciously preached the Gospel, thinking to add more affliction to his bandes. Somewhere the Gospel not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the shinges of Jesus Christ. Some went backward, dogges to their vomites, and sinne to their wallowin in the mire. The most part did draw the libeties of the Spirits to the licenciousnes of the steeple. Many brethren crept in, by whom there came af-fterward great dangers to the godlie. Among the brethren themselves were many strifes raised up. What should the Apostles have done in this case? Should they not either have distempled for a time, or rather altogether have gien over and forsaken the Gospel, which they saw to be the seedplot of so manie contensions, the master of so many dangers the occasion of so many offences? No. But for helpe in such distresse this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set unto the ruine and rising againe of manie, and for a signe that should be spoke against. With which affiance they being armed went forward boldly through al dangers of uprores & offences.
With the same thought we also ought to be upheld, forasmuch as Paul testified that this is the perpetuall propretie of the Gospel to be the sanaor of death unto death, to them that perish, although it were ordained to this use that it should be the savor of life unto life, and the power of God unto the salvation of the faithful. Which verily we should alfo feele, if we did not with our unthankfulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefite of God, and sunder that to our owne destruction which ought to have bin to us the onely defence of our safetie.

But none I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reports nothing more you, by which our adversaries travel to cast you in feare of us, with saying that by this newe Gospel (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and unpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the author of division, but of peace: and the same of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Diuell. And we are unworthy accused of such desires, whereas we ne-ever gave any suspicion were it never so small. It is likely that wee forsooth doe praife the overthrowing of kingdome, of whom there hath never bin heard any one sedition word, whose life hath our brene known quiet and simple, when we liued under you, and which nowe being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all thinges prosperous to you and your kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licenciousnesse of vices, in whose behaviors although many thinges may be found faultie, yet there is nothing worthie of so great reproching: neither have we with so ill success (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospel, but that our life may be to these backbiters an exemplar of chastissie, liberality, mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and whatsoeer other vertues. Verily it is by the proofe is selfe evident, that we doe unfaiedly feare and worship God for as-much as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life our and death, & enemie is selfe is compelled so beare of some of us a winnes of innocence & ciusiduprightness, in whom this onelie thing was punished with death, which ought to have bin accounted for a singular praisse. But if any under presence of the Gospel doe stirre up tumultes (as hither to bath not bin found that there have bin any such in your Realme) if any pretends the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licenciousnesse of their vices of which sort I have known many) there be laws & penalitie of lawes, by which they may according to their deseruings be sharply punished; yet so that in the mean time the Gospel of God be not evil spoken of for the wickednes of naughtie men. Thus have you (O King) the venemous injustice of the slaunderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an eare of too exilie belief be bound to their reportes. I scare me also least is be too largely set out, for as much as this preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole booke of defense, whereby I intende not to make a defense in deede, but onelie to mollifie your mind aforehand and gaine audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from us, yea and enflamed against us, yet we trust that we shallbe able to recover the favor thereof, if you shal once have without displeasure and troublous affection red over this our confesiion, which we will to be instead of a defense for us to your maiestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious do so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused me, to speake for themselves: and if those outrageous stories doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with prisiong, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shal in deede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities: ye so that in our patience we shal possesse our soules, and waite for the strong hand of the Lord: which shal without doubt be presente in time, and stretch forth his selfe armed, both to deliver the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumph with so great assurance.

The Lorde the King of Kings, establish your throne with rightouesnesse, and your seate with equitie, most noble King.

I JOHN CALVIN TO THE READER.

At the first setting out of this work, because I did not looke for that success, which the Lord of his vnmeasurable goodnesse hath given, I had (as men yse to doe in small workes) for the more part lightly passe it over. But when I vnderstood that it was receiued with that favoure of all the godly, which I never durst haue desired, much leffe haue hoped for: as I verilie felt in my heart that much more was giuen to me than I had deferued, so I thought it should be a great vnthankfulness if I should not at the leaft after my slender abilitie endeauor to answere so fauorable affections toward me, and which of them felues prouoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onelie in the second setting forth of it: but howe oft since that time the worke hath bin imprinted, so oft hath it bin enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labor that I had imploied: yet I neuer held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I haue giuen you that which may be allowed by al your judgements; Truely with how great endeauor I haue applied my selfe to the doing of this service to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an euident witnessse, that this last winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had summoned me to death, howe much more the sickenes enforced upon me, so much leffe I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to overlie me, which might make some part of thankfull recopence to so gentle prouoking of the godly, I had rather in deed it had bene done sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thynke that it is come abroad in good seafon, when I shall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentiful fruite than it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely desire. And truely full ill it were with me, if I did not holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, desipe the judgementes of men, whether they be the foolish and froward judgementes of the vskilfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly seted my minde to the endeauor both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleare in mine owne conscience, and haue himselfe and the Angels to wittesse with me, that since I tooke vpon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I haue tended to none other purpose but that
To the Reader.

that I might profite the Church in maintaining the pure doctrine of godli-nes: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath ben snatcht at, bitten, & torne in sunder with no flaunderes than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly enformed that at Augsburg where the assembly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my revolting to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily receiued in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignoorant of many trialles had of my nedfastnes, which trialles as they shake off so foule a flaunder, so they should with all indifferent and gentle judges have defended me from it. But the Druell with his whole route is deceived if in oppressing me with filthy lies, he thinke that by his vnjust dealing I shal be either the more discouraged or made the leffe diligent; because I thinke that the Lord of his vnmeasurable goodness will grant me that I may with euen suffrance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I gue to the godly reader a newe proofe in this setting forth of this Booke. Nowe in this trauell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy diuinitie to the reading of the worde of God; that they may both have an eafe entrie into it, & go forward in it without stumbling: for I thinke that I have in all points so knit vp together the summe of religion, & disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well haue it in minde, it shall not be harde for him to determine both what hee ought chiefely to seeke in the Scripture, and to what marke to apply what soever is conteined in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plaine, if I shal hereafter set forth any expostitions of Scripture, because I shall not neede to enter into long diisputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I wil alwaie knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shalbe caed of great paine & tediousnes, so that he come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessarie instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clearly as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare in deede what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receiue any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

WHAT CHAPTERS ARE contained in the Bookes of this Institution.

In the first booke which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator, are contained xviii. Chapters.

That the knowledge of God, & of our felues, are things conyoned:
and howe they be linked the one with the other.

2 What it is to knowe God, and to what end tendeth this knowledge of him.
3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.
4 That the same knowledge is either choked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.
5 That the knowledge of God doeth shiningly appear in the making of the worlde, and in the continuaall government thereof.
6 That to atteine to God the creator, it is needfult to have the Scripture to be our guide and maistresse.
7 By what testimonie the Scripture ought to bee stablished, that is by the witnesses of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remaine certaine: And that it is a wicked invention to say that the credit thereof doth hang upon the judgement of the Church.
8 That so farre as mans reason may bear, there are sufficient proofs to stablish the credit of the Scripture.
9 That those fantastical men, which forsaking Scripture, refort unto revelation, doe overthrow all the principles of godlinesse.
10 That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all Gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.
11 That it is unlawful to attribute unto God a visible forme, & that generally, they forsake God, so many as doe correct to themselves any images.
12 That God is severally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.
13 That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence containeth in it three persons.
14 That the Scripture euin in the creation of the worlde, and of all things, doth by certaine marks put difference betweene the true God, and faigned Gods.
15 What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, and of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.
16 That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the worlde, which himselfe hath created, and by his providence doth governe all the partes thereof.
17 Whereunto and to what ende this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.
18 That God doth so use the service of wicked men, and so boweth their mindes to put his judgement in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

In the second booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, which knowledge was first opened to the fathers in the time of the lawe, and then to vs in the Gospell: are contained xvij. Chapters.

That by Adams sinne and falling away, mankinde became accursed, & did degenerate from his first estate: wherein is entreated of original sinne.

That
2 That man is now spoiled of the freedom of will, and made subject to miserable bondage.
3 That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.
4 How God worketh in the hearts of men.
5 A confutation of the objections that are wont to be brought for the defence of freewill.
6 That man being lost must seek for redemption in Christ.
7 That the law was given, not to holde still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of salvation in Christ, untill his comming.
8 An exposition of the morall lawe.
9 That Christ although he was known to the lewes under the law, yet was he delivered onely by the Gospel, of the likeness of the olde & new Testament.

In the thirde booke which intreateth of the manner howe to receive the grace of Christ, and what fruities come thereunto to vs, and what effectes follow of it, are contained xxv. Chapters.

1 That those things which are spoken of Christ doe profit vs, by secret working of the holy Ghost.
2 Of faith, wherein both is the definition of it, and the properties that it hath are declared.
3 That wee are regenerate by faith, wherein is intreated of repentance.
4 That all that the Sophisters babble in their schooles of penance, is far from the pureness of the Gospel: where is entreated of confession & Satisfaction.
5 Of the supplyings which they add to satisfaction, as pardons & purgatory.
6 Of the life of a Christian man. And first by what argumentes the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.
7 The summe of a Christian life: where is entreated of the forsaking of our felues.
8 Of the bearing of the Cross, which is a parte of the forsaking of our felues.
9 Of the meditatio of the life to come.

10 Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.
11 That it behooved that Christe to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.
12 That Christe tooke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.
13 Howe the natures of the Mediator do make one person.
14 That we may knowe to what ende Christ was sent of his father, & what he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his prophetical office, his kingdoms, & his priesthooде.
15 Howe Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase salvation for vs, wherein is entreated of his Death and resurrection, and his Ascending into heauen.
16 That it is truely and properly said, that Christ hath deserved Gods favour and salvation for vs.

17 The agreement of the promises of the Lawe and the Gospell.
18 That of the reward, the righteousnes of worke is ill gathered.
19 Of Christian libertie.
20 Of prayer which is the cheepe exercice of faith, and whereby wee daily receive the benefits of God.
21 Of the eternall election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, some other to destruction.
22 A confirmation of this doctrine by the testimonies of Scripture.
23 A confutation of the flanders, wherewith this doctrine hath alway beene vnjustly charged.
24 That Election is established by the calling of God, and that the reprobate doe bring vpon them selves the iust destruction, to which they are appointed.
25 Of the last Resurrection.

In the fourth booke which conteareth of the outward meanes or helps whereby God calleth vs into the fellowship of Christ, and holdeth vs in it, are contained 20 Chapters.

1 Of the true Church with which wee ought to keepe vnitie, because it is the mother of all the godly.
2 A comparision of the false Church with the true Church.
3 Of the teachers and ministers of the church, and of their election and office.
4 Of the state of the olde church, and of the maner of gouerning that was in vse before the papacie.
5 That the olde forme of government is utterly ouerthrown by the tyranny of the papacie.
6 Of the supremacie of the Sea of Rome.
7 Of the beginning and encreasung of the papacie of Rome, vntill it advanced itselfe to this height, whereby both the libertie of the church hath beene oppreseed, and all the right gouernment thereof ouerthrown.
8 Of the power of the church as touching the articles of faith: and with howe vnbridled licentiousnesse it hath in the papacy bin wrested to corrupt al purenesse of doctrine.
9 Of councelues and of their authority.
10 Of the power in making of lawes wherein the pope and his haue vled a most cruelly, tyranny and butcherie vpon foules.
11 Of the jurisdiction of the church and the abuse thereof, such as is seen in the papacy.
12 Of the discipline of the Church, whereof the chaffe vse is in the censures and excommunication.
13 Of vowes, how promizing whereof eche man hath miserably entangled himself.
14 Of Sacraments.
15 Of baptism.
16 That the baptisme of Infantes doth very well agree with the institution of Christ, and the nature of the signe.
17 Of the holy Supper of Christ, and what is availeth vs.
18 Of the popish Masse, by which sacrilidge the supper of Christ hath not onely bin prophane, but also brought to nought.
19 Of the false falcifie named Sacraments: where is declared, that the other falcifie which haue bin hitherto commonly taken for sacraments, are not Sacraments: and then is shewed what manner of things they be.
20 Of civill gouernement.

FINIS.
THE FIRST BOOKE
OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.
That the knowledge of God, and of our selves, are things conniected:
and how they be linked the one with the other.

The whole summe in a manner of all our wisedome, which onely ought to be accompted true and perfect.
Wisedome, consisteth in two partes, that is to saye, the knowledge of God, and of our selves. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bondes linked together: yet whether goeth before or engendereth the other, it is hard to discerne. For, first, no man can looke upon him selfe, but he must needs be and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whose he lieth and is mov'd: because it is plaine, that those gifts wherewith wee be indued, are not of our selves, yea, cuen that that we have being is nothing els but an essence in the one God.
Finally, by these good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heaven, we are led as it were by certaine streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereinto the fall of the first man hath throwne vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes, not onely being foodless and hungrie, to craue from thence that which wee lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humilitye. For as there is found in man a certaine world of all miseries, and since we haue ben spoyleded of the diuine apparell, our shamefull nakedness discloseth an infinite heape of filthie disgracemens: it must needs be that every man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne vnhappinesse to make him come at the leaft vnto some knowledge of God. So by the understanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggerie, weakes, peruerfenes, & corruption, wee learne to acknowledge that no where else but in the Lorde abideth the true light of wisedome, found vertue, perfect abundance of all good things, and purifie of rightoufnes. And so by our owne euils wee are stirr'd to consider the good things of God: and we cannot earnestly aspire toward him, vntill we beginne to mislike our selves. For of all me what one is there, that would not willingly rest in him selfe? yea, who doth not rest, so long as he knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne gifts, & ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne miserie? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

Cap. 1. Of the knowledge of

2. Again, it is certain, that man never commeth unto the true knowledge of his self, yea, he hath first beheld the face of God, and from beholding thereof do descend to looke into himself. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy. until that with manifest proues wee be convinced of our vnrightheousnesse, filthinesse, follie and vncléannes. But we are not convinced thereof, if we looke vpon our selues only, and not vpon God also, who is the only rule whereby this judgement ought to be tried. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrite, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousnes doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousnes in deed. And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, y is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthy pleased vs as though it were most pure, so long as we hold our selues within the boundes of mans vncléanne. Like as the eye that is vfed to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discerne by our bodily sense how much wee are blinded in considering the powers of the foule. For if at midday we either looke downe vpon the ground, or behold those things that round about lye open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to have verie affurded and piercing force of sight; but when wee looke vp to the sunne, and beholde it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpnes that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightnesse by and by defauld and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse y the same sharp sight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the sunne, is but meere dulnes. Even so commeth it to passe in weying our spirituall good things. For while wee looke no further than the earth, so long being well contented with our owne righteousnesse, wisedome and strenght, wee doe sweettely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner halfe gods. But if wee once begin to raife vp our thought vnto God, and to wey what a one he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisedome & power, after the rule whereof wee ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with fals pretence of righteousnes, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednesse: then that which did maruilinearly deceiue vs vnder colour of wisedome, shall finde before vs as extreme follie; then that which did beare the face of strenght, shall be proued to be most miserable weaknesses. So slenderly doth that which in vs seemeth euen most perfect, answer in proportion to the purenes of God.

3. Hereof proceedeth that trembling and amasednes, wherewith the scripture in manie places reciteth that the holy men were stricken & astonishe to often as they perceived the presence of God. For when we see they which in his absence did stand assured & vnmove, so fone as he discloseth his glory, begin so to quake & are so dismaid, that they fall downe, yea are swallowes vp, & in manner as destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered therby, that man is never sufficiently touched & inwardly moved with knowledge of his owne bafenes, vntil be haue compared himself to the maiestie of God. But of such dismaying we haue often examples both in the Judges & in y Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: Wee shall dye because... because the Lord hath appeared unto vs. And therefore the historick of Job, to throw men down with knowledge of their own folly, weaknesses, & uncleanness, bringeth alway his principall proove from describing Gods wisedome, strength & cleanness; and that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the nearer that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowledg’d himselfe to be earth & dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tare his comming to him with uncovered face: so terrible is the beholding of him.

And what man do that is but corruption and a worme, when even the Cherubins for verie feare must hide their faces? Even this is it that the Prophet Esaie speakehth of: The Sunne shall blust, & the Moone shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hostes shall raigne, that is to saye, when he displayeth his brightenes, and bringeth it nearer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brightest thing of all shall be darkened. But howsoever the knowledge of God and of our selues, are with mutual knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth that first wee intreat of the knowledge of God, and after come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selues.

What it is to know God, and to what end rendereth the knowledge of him.

I. Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby wee perceiue that there is some God, but also that, whereby wee learne so much as behoueth vs to knowe of him, and as is profitable for his glorie: fiinally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, wee cannot saye that God is known where there is no religion nor godliness. But here I doe not yet touch that special kind of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed do conceiue God, the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake only of that first & simple manner of knowledge, wherein to the verie order of nature would have led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, in this ruine, can perceiue God to be either a father, or author of salvation, or in any wise favourably vnlesse Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towards vs: yet it is one thing to feele that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his providence governeth vs, by his goodness nourisheth vs, and endueth vs with all kinds of blessings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the redeemer: hereupon arise two sortes of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our mind cannot conceiue the knowledge of God, but it must give to him some kind of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simply to know that it is he only that ought to be honored & worshipped of all men, vnlesse we be also persuaded that he is the fountain of all good things, to the ende that we should secke for nothing elsewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, so by his infinite power hee sustainteth it, by his wisedome he governeth it, by his goodnes he preserueth it.
and specially mankind he ruleth by his righteousness and judgements, suffreth by his mercy, and sauegardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisedome, or of light, or of righteousness, or of power, or of truth, which floueth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verily, that we should learne to looke for & craue all these things at his hand, and with thanksgiving account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a mere scholemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion, Godlines I cal a reuence of God foynd with loue of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefites. For men will neuer with willing obedience submit themselves to God, untill they perceiue that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea, they will neuer yeeld themselves truely & with all their heart wholly to him, vntles they assuredly beleue that in him is perfect felicitie repos'd for them.

2 Therefore they do but trifle with vaine speculations, which in entreating of this question, do make it their purpose to discouer, what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to knowe what manner one he is, & what agreeeth with his nature. For to what end fyruch it to confesse as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth onely delight himselfe with idlenesse, haung no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we may have nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serue to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reuence: then that by it guding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his band, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou must therewithall be and by thinke, that forasmach as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subject & bound to his authority, that thou owest him thy life, y, whatsoever thou enterprisest, whatsoever thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it foloweth that thy life is peruersely corrupted if it be not fram'd to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our lawe to live by. Againe, thou canst not cleerely see him, but that thou must needs know that he is a fountaine & original of all good things, whereupon should growe both a desire to cleae vtro him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptnesse did not drawe his minde from the right searching of him. For ifst of all, the godly mind doth not as by a dreame imagine to her selfe any God at adventure, but steadfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God; and doeth not falsely forge of him whatsoever her selfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be such a one as he declareth himselfe, & doth always with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse he passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the way. And when shee so knoweth him, because shee understandeth that he governeth all things, shee assuredly trusteth that he is her safe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth her selfe to his faith, because shee understandeth that he is the author of all good things: therefore if anything trouble her, or if she want any thing, by and by the hyth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is persuaded. ded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence the reflected on him, and doubteth not in all her evils to finde ready remedie in his mercifull kindnesse. Because she knoweth him to be her Lord & father, therefore the determineth that he is worthie that he should in all things have regard to his authority, reverence his maiestitie, procure the aduancement of his glorie, and obey his commandements. Because shee seeth that hee is a righteous Judge, and armed with his seueritie to punish sinners, therefore the alway setteth his judgement sear before her eyes, and with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth her selfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is shee not so afraid with the feeling of his judgement, that shee would conuey her selfe from it, although there were away open to escape it: but rather shee doth no leffe love him, while he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, than while he is beneficial to the godly, forasmuch as shee vnderstandeth that it doth no leffe belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and cuil doers, than that he hath rewardes of eternall life for the righteous. Moreover shee doeth not for onely fear of punishment restraineth her selfe from sinning: but because shee loueth and reverenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet the dreadeth his onely displeasure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, euene faith joyned with an earnest feare of God: so that fear may containe in it a willing reverence, and draw with it a right forme of worshipping such as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, because all men generally do worship God, but fewe do reverence him, while ech where is great pompous shewe in ceremo- nies, but the purenesse of heart is rare to be found.

3 Truely, they that judge rightly, wil alwaye holde this for certaine, that there is graven in the minds of men a certaine feeling of the Godhead, which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this persuasione, that there is a God, is euene from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the verie obstinacie of the wicked is a substantia witness, which with their furious striving yet can never winde them selves out of the feare of God. Although Diagon.es and such other do jest and laugh at all that hath in all ages beeene beleued concerning religion: although Dionysius do scoffe at the heauenly judgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth for- ward, because inwardly the worke of conscience gnaweth them much more sharply than all hot fearing irones. I allege not this Cicero saith, that errors by continuance of time growe out of vse, & religion daily more and more encreaseth and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we shall have occasio to shew) trauailleth as much as in it lieth to shake off all knowledge of God, & by al means to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dull hardnesse, which the wicked doe desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doth lyue pyningly in their heartes, yet the same feel- ing of God, which they would moaste of all desire to have vterly destroyed, lyueth still, and sometime doth vnder it selfe: whereby wee gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in scholes, but such a one whereof eve- ry man is a teacher to himselfe euene from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bend all their endeour to shake it out of their minde. Nowe, if all men be borne and doe live to this ende, to knowe God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheath away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is evident, that they all swarue out of kinde from the lawe of their creation, that doe not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselfes were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likeness of God, when the soule haung thoroughly conceived the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore verie aptly doth Grilus reason in Plutarke, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not only nothing better than brute beasts, but also many wais much more miferable, for that being subject to so many fontes of evils, they continually draw forth a troublesome vnquiet life: and therefore the worshipping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brute beasts, by which alone they aspire to immortalitie.

The third Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minde of men.

We hold it out of controvertie, that there is in the mind of man, euene by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the ende that no man shoulde flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine understanding of his divine majestie, the remembrance whereof, with powring in nowe and then as it were newe drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, doe knowe that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all bee condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they have not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God bee any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grossest fontes of peoples & fardeft from civil order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man faith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kind of people so savage, in whom resteth not this persuasion that there is a God. And euene they that in other partes of their life seeme verie hile to differ from brute beasts, yet do continually keepe a certaine feede of religion. So throughe hath this common principle possest all mens minde, so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bin no countrie, no citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of Godhead is written in the hearts of al men. Yea and idolatric it selfe is a substantiall prooue of this persuasion. For we know how unwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honor other creatures above himselfe. Therefore when hee had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted persuasion of God is of moste great force, which is impossible to be rased out of the mind of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as in deede it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will stouepeh downe downe even to the basest creatures to honor God.

2. Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was devised by the subtile and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselves that procured other to worship God, beleefe nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I grant in deed, that simple men have invented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a subjection, & cast them in a fear, to make their minds the more pliable to obedience: But this they could never have brought to passe, vnsed the minde of men had beene alreadie before hands persuaded that there was a God, out of which persuasion as out of everie springeth that readie inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that even they which subtilely deceived the simple sorte with colour of religion, were themselves altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue beene some, and at this day there arise vp many that denye that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes finde that which they are desirous not to knowe. We read of none that ever did breake foot into more presumptuous and unbridled despising of God, than Cains Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilful purpose he endeavoured to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is hee troubled at the vray noyse of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods majestie, which doeth so much the more vehemently strike their conscience that they more labour to flee away from it? They doe in deed looke about for all the starting holes that maybe, to hide themselves from the presence of the Lorde: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tyed. For howsoever sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it oft returneth again, and with newe assault doeth runne vppon them: So that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which euans while they sleepe doth not quietly rest, because they are at every moment vexed with horrible & dreadful dreams. Therefore the vray vngodly themselves serue for an example to prove that there alway liueth in al mens minds some knowledge of God.

Thas the same knowledge is either choked,or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

But as experience teacheth that God hath sown the seede of religion in all men, so scrarce may be founde the hundredth man, that hauing it conceiued in his heart doeth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so far is it of that any fruite appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some doe of set purpope maliciously revolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So commeth it to passe that there remaineth not one godliness in the world. But whereas I said that some by errore fall into super-

The erroneous imagination which superstitious persons have of God, cannot be excused for that they are the cause of their owne blindness.

...tion, I mean not thereby as though their simplicity might excuse them from blame, because the blindness that they have, is commonly alway mingled both with proud vanity, and with stubbornness. Vanity and the same joined with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not climb above themselves as they ought to have done, but measure him according to the proportion of their own fleshly dullest, and also neglecting the sound manner of searching for him, do curiously fly to vain speculations. And so they conceive him not such a one as he offereth himself, but do imagine him such a one as of their own rash presumption they have forged him. Which gulf being once opened, what way sooner they stirre their feete, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction. For whatsoever afterwaide they go about toward the worshipping or service of God, they cannot account it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the devil of their own heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This persuerenck doth Paul expressly touch, where he faith, that they were made foolees when they couered to be wise. He had before said, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobriety, but presumptuously taking vpon them selues more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkness vpon them, yea with vaine and proud pride doe make themselves foolees. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnesse is not excusable, whereof the cause is not onely vaine curiousitie, but also a greedines to knowe more than is meete for them, joined with a false confidence.

2. As for this that David faith, that the wicked & mad men thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: First that is meant only of those that thinking the light of nature do of purpose make themselves senselesse, as wee shall see againe a little hereafter, Euen as wee see that manie after that they have been hardened with boldnesse and custome of sinning, doe curiously put from them all the remembrance of God which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly ministr'd vnto their minde. Now David, to make their madnesse the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they preciously denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking fro him his judgement & prudence, they shut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing leefe agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the gowernement of the world, and leave it to fortune, to winke at the finnes of men, so as they may live in licentious outrage unpunished: who soever he be that quenching the fear of the heavenly judgement, doth carelessly follow his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the just vengeance of God, to draw a fatnesse over their hearts, so that the wicked when they have once clofed their eyes, euen in seeing may not see. And David in an other place is the best expounder of his owne meaning, where he faith: That the fear of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Againe, that in their evil doings they proudly rejoice at themselves, because they persuade themselves that God doth not looke vp so them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they doe robb him of his glorie.
God the Creator.

2. Tim. 1. 13.

Glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot deny himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so is it truly said, that these men in caring God to be a dead and vaine image, doe deny God. Moreover it is to be noted that although they wrastle against their own natural feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heaven; yet their dull hardnesse can never so farre prevaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his judgement seat. But forasmuch as they are not withheld with any feare from running violently against God; therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutish forgetfulnes of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcibly carie them.

3 So is that vaine defense ouerthrown, which many are wonte to pretend for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any devotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it be, though it be no so much contrarie to order and trueth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetual rule: and that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or fantasie, that may be diversly fashioned after every mans liking. And truly we may plainly see, with how lying deceits superstition mocketh God, while shee goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a maner onely, which God hath testified that he carreth not for, shee either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and sayeth to bee pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoever do set vp newe invented forms of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne doting devises: because they durst not so trifle with God, vnlesse they had first sained a God, agreeing with the follies of their truffling toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vnstered and wandering opinion of the majestie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (faith he) ye knewe not God, ye served them that in nature were no gods. And in another place he faith that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they straied from right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from and forfailest the true God; whome when thou haft once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Laftantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

4 There is also a second fault, that they neither haue at any time any consideration of God, but against their wils, nor do approach toward him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawn to him: and euin then also they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods majestie, but onely a servile & constrained feare, which the judgement of God wringeth out of them: which judgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewith all they abhorre it. And so that faying of Statius, that feare first made gods in the worlde, may be fitly spoken of vngodlinesse, and of this kind of vngodlinesse only. They that haue a minde abhorring from the justice of God, doe heartily wish to haue his throne of B 5 judge-judgment overthrown, which they know to stand for punishment of offenses against his justice by which affection they warre against God, who cannot be without his judgment. But when they understand that his power is impossible to be avoided, hangeth over them: because they can neither by force remove it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they feare it. So least they should in all things seeme to despise him, whose majestie still preseth upon them, they use a certaine outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the mean time they cease not to defile themselves with all kindes of vices, to joyn outrageous mischiefs to mischiefs, until they have in all points violate the holy law of the Lord, & destroyed his whole righteousness, or at least they are not so holden back with that tainted feare of God, but they sweetly rest in their sinnnes, and flatter themselves, & had rather to follow the intemperance of their flesh than restraine it with the bridle of the holy Ghost. But forasmuch as the same is but a void and lying shadow of religion, yea severely worthy to be called a shadow: hereby againe is easily gathered, how much the true godlinesse, which is powerd onely into the hearts of the faithful, I meaneth that out of which religion springeth, doeth differ from this confusie knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses, to seeme nigh unto God, whom they flye from. For whereas there ought to have beene one continual unbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their doings carelessly rebelling against him, labour with a few sacrifices to appeale him. Wheras they ought to have serued him with holinesse of life & sincerenes of heart, they inuent triflings and obscurities of no value, to procure his favour withall: yea they do more licentiously lie dulus in their owne dregges, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their own mockeries of propiciatorie satisfactions. Finally whereas there was at length that neglecting him doe rest in themselves, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselves with such a heap of errors, that the darke mist of malice doeth choke, & at last utterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glory of God. Yet that seede still remaineth which can by no meanse be plucked vp by the roote, to beleue that there is a certaine godhead: but the same seede is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but verie evil frutes. Yea thereby is that which I travaile to prove more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in hearts of men, forasmuch as the verie reprobate themselves are of necessitie enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperitie they plesantly mock at God, yea they are full of talk & prating to diminish the greatnes of his power: but if once any desparation touch them, it stirreth them vp to seek the same God, & ministrith them sodaine short prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not utterly ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to have beene vtered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledge of God doth shinningly appeare in the making of the worldes and in the continual government thereof:

Moreover
Moreover because the furthest ende of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to perfection should be stopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the minds of men that seede of religion which we have spoken of, but also hath so disclosed himselfe in the whole workmanship of the worlde, and daily so manifestly presenteth himselfe, that men cannot open their eyes but they must needs beholde him. His substance in deed is incomprehensible, so that his divine majestie farre surmounteth all mens senses: but he hath in all his works grauen certaine marks of his glory, and those so plain and notably discernable, that the excuse of ignorance is taken away from men, be they never so groffe & dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfully cryeth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he shoulde haue faide, that then he first began to come forth to be scene in visible apparel, since the time that he first displayed his ensignes in the creation of the worlde, by which eu'n now what way soever wee turne our eyes, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the same place alfo the same Prophet aptly compareth the heavenes as they be diplayed abroad, to his royal pavillion: he saith that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth vpon the wings of the windes, that the windes and lightenings are his swift messengers. And because the glory of his power and wisedome doeth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his palacie. And first of all, what way soever thou turne thy eyes, there is no piece of the world be it neuer so small, wherein are not scene at least some sparkles of his glory to shine. But as for this most large & beautiful frame, thou canst not with one viewe perceiue the wide compass of it, but that thou must needs be on every side overwhelmd with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth very wel call the ages of the world the spectacle of inuisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world serueth vs for a mirrour wherein we may behold God, which otherwise is invisible. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heauenly creatures a language that all nations understand, for that in them there is a more euideat testification of the Godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly saith, that there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behouefull to be knowen concerning God; because all men without exception, do thoroughly see his invisible things eu'n to his verie power and Godhead, which they understand by the creation of the world.

2 As for his wonderfull wisedome, there are innumerable proues both in heaven and in earth that wittissee it: I mean not onely that secreter sort of things, for the neerer marking whereof Astrologie, Phisicke, & all natural Philosophy serueth, but eu'n those things that thrush themselfes in sight of euery one, eu'en of the rudest unlearned man, so that men cannot open their eies but they must needs be witnesses of them. But truely they that haue digested, yea or but tastted the liberal arts, being holpen by the ayde thereof, doe proceede much further to looke into the secrets of Gods wisedom. Yet is there no man so hindred by lack of knowledge of those arts, but that he thoroughly seeth

feeth aboundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods works, to bring him in admiration of the workeman thereof. As for example to the searching out of the mouings of the starrs, appointing of their places, measuring of their distancies, and noting of their properties, there needeth art & an exacter diligence: by which being thoroughly perceived, as the prudence of God is the more manifestly dislosed, so it is convenient, that the mind rife somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glorie. But forasmuch as the unlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the onely helpe of their cies, cannot be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so severally well ordered and disposd varietie doth of it selfe shew forth it selfe: it is evident that there is no man to whom God doeth not largely open his wisedome. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpnes of wit, to wry with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportional agreement, the beautie, & vse in the frame of mans bodie: but by al mens confession, the body of man doth utter in verie shew of it selfe so cunning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be judged wonderfull.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in olde time did not without cause call man a little worlde, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnesse and wisedome of God, and containeth him selfe miracles ynownd to occupy our mindes, if wee will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had said that the verie blindie men may find out God by groping for him, by & by faith further, that he is not to be sought farre of, because al men doe feele undoubtedly within themselves the heavenny grace wherewith they be quickened. But if we neede to go no further then our selues, to finde & take holde of God: what pardon shall his slothfulnesse deserve that will not vouchsafe to defend into his selue to finde God? And the same is the reason why David, when he had shortly spoken in the aduancement of the wonderfull name & honour of God that do every where gloriously shine, by & by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindfull of him? Again, Out of the mouth of infants & sucking babes thou hast established strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kind of man is a mirror of the works of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breasts, haue tongues eloquent enough to preach his glorie, so that there needeth no other orators. And therefore he doubteth not to set their mouthes in the vaward, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse that would according to their diuellish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul alledgeoth out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God: because he garnisht vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euery by comon reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truely no man will assentingly and willingly yeeld him selfe to serve God, but he that having tasted his fatherly love, is mutually allured to love and worship him.

merable works of God, and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plenty of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praising of him, are contrariwise puffed up and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They seele how dierely in maruellous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience itselfe, how great variety of gifts they possess of his liberalitie: whether they wil or no, they are enforced to knowe, that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppresse it close within them. Truely they neede not to go out of them selues, so that they would not in presumptuously taking vpon themselues that which is giuen from heauen, burie within the ground that which brightly glister light to their minds to see God. But even at this day the earth beareth many monisterous spirites, which sticke not to abuse the whole seede of godhead that is sowne in mans nature, & to employ it to oppresse the name of God. How deterable, I pray you, is this madness, that man finding God a hundred times in his bodye and his soule, shoulde by the verie same pretence of excellencie deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chaunce made different from brute beasts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things; and so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eyes euin to the nails of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, doe represent a divine nature that doeth not easily suffer it selve to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes would (bearing themselues bold vp to this hie degree) outragiously make warre against God. Do the whole treasures of the heauenly wise dome so meete together, to rule a worle of fine seete long, and shal the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde bee without this prerogative? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the partes of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answer mee, what meeting of vnmiuable bodies, boying the mete & drinke in man, doeth dispose parte into excrementes and parte into bloud, and bringeth to pase that there is in all the members of man such an endeavouring to doe their office, euin as if so manie severall soules did by common adusse rule one bodie.

5 But I have not now to doe with that filie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being giuen to sutetlies, would by crooked conuenience with that cold say ing of Aristote, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumental powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bind the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, & with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being enclosed in those exercises that crete the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the farres, to learn the greatnesse of one, to knowe what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or y way? I graunt in deede that Thy obscure the glory of God, who bindes the soule in such forces vnto the body, or they take from it those operations wherein depending not at all upo corporall instruments do both shew the divine nature of the soule, and the powerfull prouidence of him that created it.

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of that there is some use of Astrologie: but my meaning is only to shewe that in this so deep searching out of heavenly things, it is not an instrumental measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe seuerall from the bodie.

I have thew one example, by which it shalbe eafe for the readers to gather the rest. Truely the manifold nimblenesse of the soule, by which it surveyeth both heaven & earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, & expresseth eche thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingenioUstnesse by which it iuenteth things incredible, & which is the mother of so many marueilous artes, are sure tokens of divine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleepeing it doth not only roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiueth manie things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophesieth of things to come. What shal we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shalbe of divine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall wee forsooth by judgement that is put into vs dicerne between right & wrong, & shal there be no judge in heauen? Shall we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of understanding, & shal no God be waking in governing the world? Shall we be so counted the inuenter of so many artes and profitable things, that God shal be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from an other and not from ourselues, all that we haue, is in diuerse wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some do babble of the secret inspiration that giueth lumininesse to the world, it is not only weake, but also vngod-ly. They like wel that famous saying of Vergil:

First heaven and earth, and flowing feldes of sea,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titan's stars, Spirite seedes within, and through out all the limes, Infusid minde the whole huge masse doth move,
And with the large bigge bodie mixe is selfe, Thence come the kinds of men and eke of beasts,
And lines of flying foules, and mony of strange, That water beare within the marble Sea.
A feiere lumininesse and heavenly race there is Within thofe seedes, &c.

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the creator of it selfe, So in another place the same author following the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, sayth:

Some say that bee have part of minde divine,
And heavenly daughters, for eke they say that God Goth through the coasts of land, and creeks of sea,
And through deepse skie, and hence the flockes and herdes,
And men and all the kinds of strange beasts Ech as their birthreceiue their subtle lines, And there is they rendered all as lath
And all resolue are remand againe.
No place there is for death: but linely they,
The number of the stars above,
And take their place within the loftie skie.

Loe, what that hungry speculation of the universal minde that giveth soule and line insens to the world, auailcath to engender and nourish godlines in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appear by the blaspemous sayings of the filthie dogg Lucretius, which are derived from the same principle. Even this is it, to make a shade with God, to drive farre away the true God from us. We ought to feare and worship. I graunt in deede that this may be godly said, so that it procedeth from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an unproper manner of speech, forasmuch as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religioine, it is hurtful to wrap vp God confusedly with the inferior course of his works. Let vs therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which doth governeth all natures, that his will is to have vs looke vn to him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called vpon of vs: because there is nothing more against conueniencie of reason, than for vs to enjoy those excellent gifts that favour of divine nature in vs, and to despise the author that freely doth give them vn to vs. Nowe as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceably drawe vs to consider it, vnlesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his onely word to vphold this infinite maue of heauen and earth, with his onely becke, sometyme to shake the heauen with noife of thunders, to burne vp eche thing with lightenings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames, sometyme to trouble it with diuers fortes of tempestes, and by and by the same God when he lift in one moment to make faire weathers to holde vp the Sea, as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heighth seemeth to threaten continual destruction to the earth, sometyme in horrible wise to raise it vp with outrageous violence of windes, and sometyme to appease the waues and make it calme againe. For proffe hereof doe ferue all the praisef of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, specially in the booke of Iob & in Epay, which nowe of purpose I ouerpasce, because they shall els where have an other place fitter for them, where I shall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers and they of the houseold of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these first draughts which both aboue and beneath doe as in a shadoue set forth a liuely image of him. And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie. For it must needs be, that he from whome all things have their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himselfe. But nowe if any man enquire the cause whereby he both was once lead to creat all these things, and is now moved to preferue them; we shall finde that his onely goodnes was it that caused him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the loue of him, for as much as there is no creature (as the Prophet sayeth) vpon which his mercy is not powred out.
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

6 Also in the second sort of his works, I mean those that come to passe beside the ordinary course of nature, there doeth appeare no lesser euident prooves of his powers. For in gouerning the fellowship of men he doth ordereth his prouindence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his favourabe kindnes to the godly, and his feueritie to the wicked and euil doers. For not doubtfull are the punishmentes that he layeth upon haynes offenses: like as he doth openly shew himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpe their neceffitie, affwageth & comforteth their sorrowes, relieueth their calamities, & by all meanes prouideth for their safetie. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his justice, that he oftentimes permiteth wicked men and euil doers for a time to rejoyce vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many aduersities, yea & to be oppresed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrarie consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shewe of his wrath he punislieth one sin, we should therfore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished, we should thereupon thinke that there shalbe an other judgment to which they are diiffered to be then punished. Likewise howe great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercie, while he oftentimes ceafteth not to shew his vnweared bountifullnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, vntill he have subdued their frowardnes with doing them good.

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in causes past hope, doeth sodenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in miserie and in a manner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wilderness from the wilde beasts, and at length leadeth them int o the way againe, or ministreth foode to the needie and hungrie, or delivereth prisoners out of horrible dungeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in peril of shipwreck safe into the haue, or healeth the half dead of diseases, or seereth earth with heat & driness, or maketh it fruitful with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the baseft of the rascall people, or throweth downe the notable Peeres from the hie degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed forth, he gathereth that those thinges which are judged chaunces happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specially of his fatherly kindnesse, and that thereby is giuen matter of rejoycing to the godly, and the wicked & reprobate haue their mouthes stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errosses are blinde in so cleare a place of beholding,therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare & singular wisedome, wisely to woy these workes of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit that otherwise seeme most cleere sighted. And truely howe much sower glory of God doth apparatly shine before them, yet scarcely the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power & wisedom are no more hid in darknes, whereof the one, his power, doeth notably appeare, when the fierce outrageousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion vn-conquerable, is beate flat in one moment, their arrogancies tamed, their strongest holds raised, their weapons & armour broken in pieces, their strength subdues, their devises overthrown, and themselves fall with their own weight, the presumptuous boldness, that announced it self abow the heavens is thrown down even to the bottom point of the earth: againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, & the needle raised from the dognil, the oppressed & afflicted are drawn out of extreme distresse, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, the unarmed bear away the victorie from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisedome, it self sheweth it self manifestly evident, while it disposeth every thing in fittest opportunitie, confoundeth the w. some of the world be it never so piercing, sendeth out & subtile in their subtiltie, finally gouerneth all things by most convenient order.

8. We see that it needeth no long or laborsome demonstration, to fetch out testimonies to serve for the glorious declaration & profe of God's majestie: for by these fewe that we have touched, it appeareth, that which way so ever a man chance to looke, they are so common & readie that they may be easily marked with eye, & pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that wee are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doeth but flye about in the braine, but such as shall be found & fruitful, if it be rightly conceived & take roote in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we feele within vs, & do enjoy the benefits of them, it must needs be that we be inwardly mov'd much more lively with such a knowledge, than if we should imagin God to be such one, of whom we should have no feeling. Whereby we understand that this is the rightest way & fittest order to seeke God, not to attempt to enter deely with presumptuous curiositie throughly to discuss his Subfacle, which is rather to be reverently worshipped than scrupulously searched; but rather to behold him in his worke, by which he maketh himselfe cere & familiar, & doth in a maner communicate himselfe vnto vs. And this the Apostle meaneth, when he said, that God is not to be sought a farre of, forasmuch as he with his most present power dweliseth within every one of vs. Wherefore David having before confessed his unspeakable greatness, when he descended to the particular rehearsal of his worke, profeffeth that the same will shew forth it self. Therefore we also ought to give our felues into such a searching out of God, as may so holde our wit suspending with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly move vs with effectual feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceive him, it behoueth vs as it were fainting under the burden of his greatness, to looke vnto his worke, that we may be refreshed with his goodnes.

9. Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but alfo to awake vs, and raise vs to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifullnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke that herein he doth but make a shewe afore hande of those things, whereof the open disclosing & ful delivrance is differred vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that, godly are by the vngodly griefed.
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of grieved with afflictions, troubled with injuries, oppressed with slaughters, and vexed with despitful dealings and reproaches: contrariwise that wicked dooms do flourish, prosper and obtain quiet with honour, yea, and that vnpunished: we must by and by gather that there shall be another life, wherein is lay'd vp in store both due requiem for wickedness, and rewarde for rightcountes. Moreover when we note that the faithfull are often chastis'd with the roddes of he Lord, wee may most certainly determine that much lesse the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine,

If every sinne should now be punished with open paine, it would be thought that nothing were refereed to the last judgement. Againe, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleued, that there were no providence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in every particular worke of God, but principally in the univerall generallitie of them, the powers of God are set forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is pronounced and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers do in his worke most brightly appeare, ye: what they principally tende vnto, of what value they be, and to what end we ought to wye them: this we then only attaine to understand when we descend into our selues, and do consider by what meanes God doth therefor in vs his life, wisedome, and power, and doth use towards vs his rightcounsles, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnessse. For though David justly complaineth, that the vnbeleuwing do dote in folly, because they wot not the deepe counsalfes of God in his gouernance of mankind: yet, that is also most true, which he sayth in another place, that the wonderfull wisedome of God in that behalfe exceedeth the hayres of our head. But because this point shall hereafter in place convenient be more largely entreated, therefore I doe at this time passe it over.

God manifesting himselfe, men profit not by it, because they beholde things done without regarding the doer, or they ascribe that to fortune which he doeth, or if they have some feeling of God, they de-prave it with doings, in which faults is common unto all, even the sharpest

10. But with howe greate brightnesse souer God doeth in the mirror of his workes shewe by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdom of such is our grosse bloudinesse, that we stande dully amased at so plain testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without proffite. For, as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the world, how many a one is there of vs, that when hee either lifteth vp his eyes to heaven, or caneth them about on the divers countries of the earth, doeth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, & doth not rather rest in beholding the workes without having regard of the workman? But as touching those things that daily happen beside the order of naturall course, how many a one is there that doeth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about & rowled by blinde vnadvisednesse of fortune, than governed by providence of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding & direction of these things driven to the consideration of God, (as all men must needs be) yet so soone as we have without aduilemement conceived a feeling of some godhead, we by

& by slide away to the dotages or erroneous iuentiones of our flesh, & with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So h: rein in deede we differ one fro an other, that every man privately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that wee

all
all not one excepted, do depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse witts are subject, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpnesse of understanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole seft of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dulnesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe over all the rest, which are much more unreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, saie thrice in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to give light to the rest, doe themselves to erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods governance of mens matters doth so plainly proove his proudesse, that it cannot be denied, yet this doeth no more presuade with men, than if they beleued that all things are tested vp and downe with the rafh will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanitie and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnesse hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

Hereof procedeth that unmeasurable sink of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bin filled and overflown. For eoch mans wit is to himself as a maze, so that it is no maruel that every severall nation was diversely drawn into severall deuises, and not that onely, but also that eoch severall man had his severall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnesse was joyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath beene saecely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idole or fanfie in stead of God. Truely, even as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of eoch man, while eoch man ouer licenciously straying, erroniously deuiseth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yeet I neede not here to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the worlde hath beene entangled: because both in so doing I should never haue ende, and alfo though I speake not one worde of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth howe horrible is the blindnesse of mans minde. I passe over the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reafon and learning to pearce into heauen, howe shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one doe narrowly looke upon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoickes seemed in their owne conceite to speake verie wisely, that out of all the partes of nature may be gathered diversely names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in funder. As though we were not alreadye more than enough inclined to vanitie, vnlesse a manifold plentie of gods set before vs, shoulde further and more violently draw vs into error. Alfo the Aegyptians mysticall science of divineitie sheweth, that they al diligentlie endeavoured to this end, not to seem to erre without a reafon. And it is possible, that at the first light some thing seeming probable, might deceuie the simple & ignorant: but no mortall man ever invented any thing, whereby religion hath not bin fowly corrupted.
Of the knowledge of

And this so confuse diuersifie emboldened the Epicures & other grosse despiers of godliness, by little and little to cast of all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of all to strive in contrarie opinions, they sticked not out of their disagreements, & out of the foolish or apparently erroneus doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themselues while they search for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without punishment, because it was better briefly to deny ytterly, that there is any God, than to fatigue vncertaine gods, and so to raise vp contentions that never should haue end. And too much fondly doe they reason, or rather cast a mist, to hide their vn-godlines by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing should be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all do confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned doe so much disagree, thereupon is gathered that the witnes of men are more than dull and blinde in heauenly mysteries, that do so erre in seeking out of God. Some other doe praiwe that answere of Symonides, which being demanded of King Hieron, what God was, desired to have a dayes respite graunted him to study vpon it. And when the next day following, the king demanded the same question, he required two dayes respite, and so oftentimes doubling the number of dayes at length he answered: How much the more I consider it, so much the harder the matter seemeth vnto mee. But graunteing that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to confused principles to worship an unknowne God.

It cannot be true worshipping of God vvhich is grounded only upon common reason, custom, or consent of men, being not taught by the law vvhat God they ought to worship.

12 Now we must also hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they must needes doe that are given to their owne opinion) doe depart from the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they meane, or what they persuade themselves maketh not much to matter, fifth the holy ghost pronounceth, all they are Apostataes, that according to the darknes of their own mind doe thrust diuers in the place of God. For this reason, Paul pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they had learned by the gospel, what it was to worship the true God. And we must not think this to be spoken of one nation only, for as much as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, since that in the creation of the world, the Maiestie of the creator was disclos'd vnto them. And therefore the scripture, to make place for the true & one only God, condemneth offalsehood & lying, whatsoever godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished the peculiar knowledge of God. Truely, among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Chriftes time seemed to approch nighest to true godlines: and yet we heare it spoken by Chriftes owne mouth, that they knew not what they worshipped. Wherupon foloweth, that they were deceived with vaine error. Finally, although they were not all infected with grosse faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approved religion that was grounded only vpon common reason. For

albeit, that there were a fewe that were not so mad as ye common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world conceiue not the wisdom of God. Now if ye most excellent have wander'd in darkness, what is to be said of the verie dregges? Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the holy Ghost do refuse as bastarde worshippings all forms of worshipping, devised by the wil of men. Because in heavenely mysteries opinion conceived by wit of men, although it doe not alway breede a heap of errors, yet is alway the mother of error. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no small fault, at aduenture, to worship an unknowne God: of which fault, al they by Christ's own mouth are pronounced guiltie, ye are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best law-makers that ever were, proceeded no further, than to say that religion was grounded upon common consent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherein he willed that every man should worship gods after the manner of the countrey, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortal men by this power of their owne authoritie to determine that which farre surmounteth the world? or who can foretell in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receive without doubting a God deliered by mans douise? Every man rather will stand to his own judgement, than yeilde himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake & feeble a bond of godlines, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a citie or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightened doe shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glorie of the creator, which do so euery way display their beams vpon vs, that yet of themselues they cannot bring vs into the right way. In deede they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as be choked vp before that they can spread abroad any full brightnes. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world images of things invisibl, faith further, that by faith is perceived, that they were frameth by the word of God, meaning thereby that the invisibl godhead is in deede representeth by such shewes, but that we have no eyes to see the same throughly, unless he be enlightened by the revelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be known concerning God, doeth not meane such a discovering as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather theweth, that the same proceedeth no further but to make them vnexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he faith, that God is not to be sought a far of as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in another place teacheth to what ende that neere neesse auaileth. In the ages past (faith he) God suffred the nations to walke in their owne wayes: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, giuing showers & fruitfull seasons, filling the hearts of men with foode & gladnes. Howsoever therefore the Lorde be not without testimonie, while with his great and manifold bountifullnesse he sweetely allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cease not to follow their owne wayes, that is to say, their damnable errors.

Our ignorance nev-ertheless because it commeth by our owne faultes is without excuse.

14 But although we want natural power, whereby wee cannot climbe vp into the pure and cleare knowledge of God, yet because the fault of our dullnesse is in our selues, therefore all coulour of excuse is cut awaye from vs. For we cannot so pretendt ignorance, but that euery conscience doth still condemn vs of slothfulness, and vnhankfulness: It is a defense forfooth right worthie to be receiued, if man wil alleage that he waret cares to heare the truth; for the publishting whereof the verie dumb creatures haue lowde voices; if man shall say that he cannot see those thangings with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes doe see: he may doe it: if man shall lay for his excuse the seeblenes of his wit, where all creatures without reason doe instruct: Wherefore in all things doe shew vs the right waye, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandering and straying out of the waye. But howsoever it is to bee imputed to the fault of men, that they do by and by corrupt the seede of the knowledge of God, sowne in their mindes by maruellous workmanship of nature, so that it groweth not to good and cleane fruite: yet it is most true, that wee are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple testimony, that the creatures doe honourably declare of Gods glorie: For so soone as wee haue taken by the beholding of the worlde a small taste of the godhead, we leaue the true God in stead of him raise vp dreams and fancies of owne braine, and doe conuey hither and thither from the true fountain the praise of righteousnes, wisdom, goodness and power: Moreover we doe so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, depraye his dayly doings, that wee take both from them their glorie, and from the Author his due praise.

The vi. Chapter.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needesfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maister.

The true creator and governor of the world cannot per- fasly be knowen without the word, which meaneth God hath used our sinners the beginning, to instruct his people by.

Therefore, although that same brightnesse, which both in heauen & earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, even so as God, to wrap all mankinde in one giltinesse, doth shewe his diuine maieftie to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that wee haue also an other and a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the verie Creator of the worlde. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his wordes, that thereby he might bee knowen to salvation. And this prerogative he hath vouchsafed to giue vs, whome it pleased him more nerely and more familiarly to drawe together to himselfe. For because he sawe the mindes of all men to be carried about with wandering and vnsetfast motion, after hee had chosen the Iews to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with barres, that they should not wander out in vanitie as other did. And not without caufe he holdeth vs with the same meanes in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise euene they shoulde quickly swaure away that seeme to stande setfast in comparison of other. For as olde men, or purblinde, or they whose eyes are dimme sighted, if you laye a faire booke before them, though they perceiue that there is somewhat written therein, yet can they not read two wordes together: but being holpen with spectacles set between them and it, they beginne to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our minde the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remove the mist, and plainly shewes vs the true God. This therefore is a singular grace, that to the instruction of his church God vith not only dumme teachers, but also openeth his own holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithal pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worship: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth himselfe vn-to them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to guide them all his worde. Which is the righter and certainer marke to knowe him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, & the rest of the fathers by this help attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were teemingly different from the vnbelieuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternal life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needfull for them to knowe God not only to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubtlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kinde of knowledge whereby was given to understand who is the God by whom the world was made & is governed, in order came before the other, and then was that other inward knowledge adjoynd, which only quickned dead soules, whereby God is knowen not only to be the maker of the world & the only author & judge of all things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedie thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the covenent whereby God hath adopted to him selfe the children of Abraham, & of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithful have alwayes bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake how we ought to leaerne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine marks seuerally disscerned from the counterfaite multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shall conveniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall allege many testimonies out of the new Testament, and some also out of the law & the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this ende, to prove that in the scripture is discloesd vnto vs God the creator of the world, & in the scripture is set forth what we ought to thinke of him, to the end that wee should not secke about the bush for an uncertaine godhead.

2 But whether God were knowne to the fathers by orades & visions, or whether by ye meane & ministration of men he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliver to their posterity: yet it is undoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engraven a stedfast certeintie of doctrine, so as they might be persuaded & understand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwayes made undoubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded all uncertaine opinion. At length that by
Cap. 6. Of the knowledge of continual proceeding of doctrine, the truth surving in all ages might still remaine in the world, the same oracles which hee had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to have as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this entent was the law published, wherunto after were added the Prophets for expostors. For though there were divers vies of the law, as hereafter shall better appeare in place convenient: and specially the principal purpose of Moses & all the Prophets was to teach the maner of reconciliation betweene god & men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrin of faith & repentance which sheweth forth Christ's mediators, the Scripture doth by certaine markes & tokens paint out the only & true God, in that that he hath created & doth governe the world, to the end he should be severally known & not reckned in the false number of saine gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the worke of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bend his cares to the word, that he may better profit therby. And therefore it is no maruell that they which are borne in darknesse do more & more waxe harsh in their amased dullest, because verie few of them doe give themselves plausible to learn of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather reioyce in their own vanities. Thus then ought we to hold, ye to the end true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any tast be it newer so little of true & found doctrine, vnlesse he have bin scholer to the scripture. And from hence groweth the original of true understanding, that we reuerently embrace whatsoever it pleaseth God therin to testifie of himselfe. For not only the perfect & in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truly in this behalfe God of his singular prudence hath provided for men in and for all ages.

3 For if we consider how slippery an inclination mans mind hath to flyde into forgetfulnes of God, how great a readiness to fall into all kind of errors, how great a lust to forse oftentimes newe & counterfayt religions, we may thereby perceiue how necessities was to haue the heauenly doctrine so set in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulnes, or growe vaine by errore, or be corrupted by boldnes of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alwayes vfed the helpe of his word, toward all those whom he pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because he foresaw that his image emprinted in the most beautiful forme of his world was not sufficiently effectuall: Therefore it behoueth vs to travaile this straight way, if wee earnestly count to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is wel & liuely set out by his worke, when his worke be wyes not after the peruerseoffe of our owne judgement, but according to the rule of his eternal truth. If we swarue from that word, as I said euuen now, although wee runne neuer so fast, yet wee shall neuer attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must think, ye the brightnesse of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be attaine vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which wee cannot vnwrap our selues, vnlesse... where we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for us to halt in this way, than to runne neuer so fast in another. And therefore David ofteentimes when he teacheth that superflusion are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this worde reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himselfe a lawfull governement: because errors can never be rooted out of the hearts of men, til the true knowledge of God be planted.

Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heavens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the works of his hands, that the orderly succesing course of daies & nightes preacheth his maieftie, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The lawe of the Lord (faith he) is vndeffiled, converting soules; the witnesses of the lord is faithfull, giving wisdom to little ones: the righteousnesse of the Lord are vpright, making harts cheerfull, the commandement of the Lord is bright, giving light to the eyes. For although he compreheneth also the other vses of the lawe, yet in generalitie he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call unto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the 29 Psalm, where the Prophet having preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, showers, whirlwinds and storms, shaketh the earth, maketh the moutains to tremble, and breaketh the Ceder trees: in the end at last he goeth further and faith, that his praises are sung in the sanctuarie, because the vnbelieuers are deade and heare not all the voices of God that refound in the aire. And in like manner in an other Psalm, after that he had described the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus concludeth: thy testimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holines for ever. And out of this meaning also proceeded that which Christ saide to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did honour that which they knewe not, and that onely the Iews did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feeblenesse thereof can by no meanes attaine vnto God, but being holpen and lifted vp by his holye worde, it followed of necesse, that all men, except the lewes, did wander in vanitie and errour, because they sought God without his word.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witnesse of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked surmision to say that the credit thereof doth hang upon the judgement of the Church.

But before I go any further, it is needefull to say somewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens minde to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set foorth, there is no man so desperate boldnesse, vnlesse he be void of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speaketh it. But because there are not dayly oracles gien from heauen, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased him to preferue his truth to perpetuall memorie: the fame Scripture by none other means is of full credit among the faithfull, but in that they do beleue that it is as verily come from heauen, as if they heard the luyely voice of God to speake therein. This matter in deed is right worthie both to be largely entretreated of and diligently wedy. But the readers shall pardon mee if the ein I rather regard what the proportion of the worke which I have begun may beare, than what the largenes of the matter requirith. There is grown vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authoritie as by common consent of the Church is gien unto it: as if the eternall and inuoluble truth of God did rest vppon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy ghost, they aske of vs who can assure vs that these Scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine vs that they have continued vnto our age safe and vnccorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reverently received, & that other to be striken out of the number of Scripture, vnlesse the Church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? It hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the Church, both what sauence is due to the Scripture, and what booke are to be reckened in the canon thereof. So these robbers of Gods honor, while they seeke vnder colour of the Church to bring in an unbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they share both themselves and other, fo that they may enforce this one thing to be beleued among the simple, that the Church can doe all things. But if it be so: what shal become of the poore consciences that seeke steadfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promisses that remaine thereof stande and be staid once vppon the judgement of men? When they receive such answer, shall they fease to wauer and tremble? Again, to what scorne of the vngodly is our faith made subiect? into howe great suscion with all men is it brought, if this be beleued, that it hath but as it were a borowed credit by the favour of men?

2. But such bablers are well confuted euene with one worde of the Apostle. He testifieth that the church is builded vp6 the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needs be, that the same doctrine roode in steadfast certeintie, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well caul, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof; yet it remaineth doubtfull what is to be fald of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the judgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christia Church were at the beginning built vp on the writings of the Prophets & preaching of the Apostles: wherfoever that doctrine shalbe founde, the allowed credit thereof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had neuer bin. Therefore is it a vaine forged deuise, that the Church hath power to judge the Scripture, so as the certeintie of the scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore, when the Church doth receive the scripture and seal eth it with her consenting testimonie, the doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should be be in controversie, make it autenticke and of credite: but because thee acknowledgeth it to be the trueth of her God, according to her duetie of godliness without delay thee doth honor it. Whereas they demaund, howe shal we be perswaded that it came from God, vnlesse wee referto the decre of the Church? This is all one as if a man shoulde ask, howe shal we learne to know light from darkenesse, white from blacce, or sweete from fower. For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no leffe apparent senfe of her trueth, than white and blacce things doe of their colour, or sweete & fower things of tarte.

Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of godly be stayed upon a far other foundatin. Otherwise I doe not denye but that he often preseth the Manichies with the consent of the whole church, when he seeketh to prove the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproached Paulus for that he did not yeld himselfe to the truth of the gospel so grounded, so established, so gloriously renouned and from the verie time of the Apostles by certaine Successions perpetually commended. But he never travaileth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter, he disputed of, he bringeth forth his universal judgement of the church, wherein he had the advantage of his adversaries. If any desire a fuller proove hereof, let him read his booke concerning the profit of beleewing. Where he shall find that there is no other readiness of beleefe commended vnto vs by him, but that which only giueth vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a convenient beginning to enquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to lane to the certaine and sound truth.

4 We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credit of this doctrine, is not establisht in vs, vntil such time as wee be undoubtedly persuaded: God is the author thereof. Therefore the principal proove of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apo- stles boast not of their owne sharp wit or any such things as procure credite to men that speake neither stand they vpon prooves by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compel the whole worlde to obedience. Now we haue to see how not only by probable opinion, but by apparent truth it is evident, that in this behalf the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we wil provide well for consciences, they shall not continually care about with vnstedfast doubting, nor may waver, nor stay at every small stop, this manner of persuation must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, judgements or the coniectures of men, even from the secret testimonie of the holy Ghost. True in deed it is, that if we listed to worke by way of argumentes, many things might be alleged that may easilly prove, if there be any God in heaven, that the law, the prophecies and the gospel came from him. Yea, although men learned & of deepe judgment would stand vp to the contrarie, & would employ theew forth the whole force of their wits in this disputacion: yet if they be not so hardned as to become desperately shamelesse, they would be compell'd to confess, that there are scene in the Scripture manifest tokens that it is God that spake therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine is from heaven. And shortly hereafter we shall see, all the bookes of the holy Scripture do far excel all other writings whatsoever they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eyes & uncorrupted senses, we shall forthwith find there the maieftie of God, which shall subdue al hardnes of gain-saying, and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they doe disorderly, that by disputacion troue to establisht the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truely although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence; yet if I were to contends with the most subtle despiers of God, that have a desire to shew themselves witte & pleasant in feebling the author-authority of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for mee to put to silence their bablings. And if it were profitable to spende labour in confuting their cautioues, I would with no great businesse shake in sunder the bragges that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliver the sound worde of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not forthwith to fasten in their hearts that assurednesse that godlinesse requireth. Prophane men because they thinke religion standeth onely in opinion, to the ende they would beleue nothing fondely or lightly, doe couet and require to have it proued to them by reason, that Moses and the Prophets spake from God. But I answere, that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason.

For as only God is a convienent witnesse of himselfe in his owne worde, so that the same word never find credit in the hearts of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward witnes of the holy ghost. It behoueth therefore of necessitie that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophets, do enter into our hearts to persuade vs, that they faithfully vtttered that which was by God commaunded them. And this order is verie aptly set forth by Esai in these worde: My spirit which is in thee, and the wordes that I haue put in thy mouth and in the mouth of thy seede, shall not faile for euer. It greteth some good men, that they haue not ready at hande some cleare proofe to alleage, when the wicked doe without punishment murmur against the worde of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seale and a pledge, because vntil he doe lighten mens mindes, they do alwaies waver among many doutings.

Let this therefore stand for a certainly persuaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwarnde taught, do wholly rest vpon the scripture, and the same scripture is to be credited for it selfe sake, & ought not to be made subiect to demonstration and reasons: but yet the certeintie which it getteth among vs, it attaineth by the witnes of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely majestie of it selfe it procureth reverence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it througly pears our affections, when it is sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost. So being lightned by his vertue, wee doe then beleue, not by our owne judgement, or other mens, that the scripture is from God: but aboue all mens judgement we hold it most certainly determined, even as if we beheld the majestie of God himselfe there present, that by the ministrie of men it came to vs from the verie mouth of God. Wee seeke not for arguments and likelihodes to rest our judgement vpon: but as to a thing without al compasse of consideration, we submit our judgement & wit vnto it. And that not in such sort as some are wont sometime hastily to take hold of a thing vnknowne, which after being througly perceived displeaseth them. but because we are in our consciences wel assured, & we hold an invincible truth. Neither in such sort, as silly men are wont to yeeld their minde in thralldom to superstitions: but because we vndoubtedly perceiue therein the strength & breathing of the divine majestie, wherwith we are drawen & stirred to obey, both wittingly & willingly, & yet more liuely & effectuallie than mens will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cause doeth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophets with the whole people doe bear him witnes, Esay. 5.16.
Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of

witness, because being taught by prophecies they did undoubtedly believe without guile or uncertainty that God himself had spoken. Such therefore is our persuasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintain it, even such a one, wherein the mind more assuredly & steadfastly resteth, than upon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceede but by revelation from heaven. I speake now of none other thing but that which every one of the faithfull doth by experience finde in himself, sauing that my words do much want of a full declaration of it. I leave here many things unsaid, because there willbe else where againe a convenient place to entreat of this matter. Only now let vs know, that onely that is the true faith which the spirit of God doth seale in our hearts. Yea with this only reason wil the sober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Esai promiseth, that all the children of the reuened church shalbe the scholars of God. A singular prouiledge therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect only, whom he seuereth from all the rest of mankinde. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cheerefulnes to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses, as it is written: Say not in thy heart, who shall ascend into heauen, or who shall descend into the deep: the word is euene in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of understanding be layde vp in store for his children, it is no maruel nor unlikely, that in the common multitude of men is scene such ignorance and dulness. The common multitude I call euene the most excellent of them, vntil such time as they be graffed into the body of the church. Moreover Esai giuing warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible, not only to strangers but also to the Lewes that would be accounted of the household of God, addeth this reason: because the arm of God shall not be reuiled to al men. So oft therefore as the smallnesse of number of the believers doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

The viii. Chapter.

That so farre as mans reason may heare, there are sufficient proues to establish the credit of Scripture.

Vnlesse we have this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any judgement of man, in vaine shall the authoritie of scripture either be strengthened with arguments, or stablished with consent of Church, or confirmed with any other means of defence. For vnlesse this foundation be layde, it still remaineth hauing in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, wee haue embraced it deuoutly, and according to the worthinesse of it; then these things become verie fit helpers, which before were but of small force to graffe and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is marueilous, how great establishment growth hereof, when with earnest studie wee consider how orderly & well framed a disposition of the divine wisedome appeareth therein, howe heavenly a doctrine in euerie place of it, & nothing favoring of earthenesse, howe howe beautifull an agreement of all the partes among themselfes, and such other things as auaile to procure a maiestie to writings. But more perfectly are our hearts conformed when wee consider, howe wee are even violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of wordes. For this also was not done without the sin.ular prouidence of God, that the he mysteries of the heauenly kingdome shoule for the most part bee uttered vnder a contemptible baftenie of wordes, leaft if it had beene beautified with more glorious speach, the wicked shoule cause that the onely force of eloquence doeth rainge therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doeth raise vp a greater reverence of it selfe than any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may wee judge, but that there is a more mightie strengt of truth in the holye Scripture, than that it needeth any art of wordes? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to prove that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded upon the power of God, and not vpon mans wisedome, because his preaching among them was set forth not with entising speach of mans wisedome, but in plaine evidence of the spirite and of power. For the truth is then set free from all douting, when not vpholden by foraigne aides it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But howe this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they never so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affections. Read Demosthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I grant they shal maruellously allure, delite, move, and rauish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shal so liuely move thy affections, it shal so pearce thy heart, it shal so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacie of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in manner vanish away: so that it is eafe to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: doe in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie.

2 I grant in deede, that some of the Prophets have an elegant, cleare, yea, & a beautifull phrase of speach, so as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shewe that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and groffe style. But whether a man read Dauid, Iesai, and such like, who have a sweete and pleasant flowing speach, or Amos, the heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher tale sauoureth of countrie rudeenes in euery one of them shall appeare that maiestie of the holye Ghost that I speake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfaite of God, that with deceitfull resemblance he might the better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he craftily spread abroad with rude and in manner barbarous speach those wicked errors wherewith he deceiued silly men, and hath oft times vsed discontinued phrases, that under such visor he might hide his deceites. But howe vaine and vnrealie is that curious counterfaiteing, all men that have but meane understanding doe plainly see. As for the holye Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of

of such sentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the Prophets be looked upon, there shall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capaciti, in such sort that those are to be thought, to have no judgement of taste to whom their doctrine is vnfavourie.

3 Other men have largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a few things, principally make for the principal summe of y whole matter. Beside these points that I have already touched, the verie antiquitie of Scripture is of great weight. For holoeeue y Greeke writers tel many fables of the Egyptian diuinities: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Moses. And Moses deuifeth not a new God, but setteth forth the same thing which the Israelites had receiv'd in long process of time, conuicted to them by their fathers, as it were from hand to hand concerning the euerlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the covenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing neuer heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin, But it must needs be, if the deliuirance from bondage, wher in they were detaine, was a thing well & commonly knownen among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did soothwith raise vp all their minds. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC yeares. Now it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the original deliuirance of his doctrine: howe much the holye Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie?

4 Vnlesse perhaps some lift to beleeue the Egyptians, that stretch their antiquity to five thousand yeares before the creation of the worlde. But fith their vaine babling hath bin alwaye scorned euene of all the prophane writers themselves, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosiphus against Appion, alleageth testimonies worthie to bee remem- bred out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the law hath beene famouse euene from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truely known. Nowe, that neither therc should remaine to the malitious any cause of suspicione, nor to the wicked any occasion to euill, God hath for both these daungers provided good remedies. When Moses rehearseth what Jacob almost three hundred yeares before had by heavenly inspiration pronounced upon his owne posteriti, howe dooth hee set forth his owne tribe? yea, in the person of Lewis he spotteth it with eternall infamie. Syemon (laieth hee) and Lewis the vessels of wickednesse. My soule come not into their counsell, nor my tongue into their secret. Truely, he might have past over that blotte with silence, in so doing not onely to please his father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole familie with the same shame. How can that writer be suspected, which unconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the holy Ghost, that the principal auncenstere of the familie whereof himselfe descended was an abominable doer, neither privately provided for his owne honour, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kinmen, whom undoubtedly this matter grieved? When also he rehearseth the wicked murmu-murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Marie his sister: shall we saie that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreouer, sith himselfe was hyest in authoritie, why did he not leue at leaft the office of the hye priefthood to his owne sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touche here onely a fewe things of manie. But in the lawe it selfe a man shall ech where meere with many arguments that are able to bring full proffe to make men beleue that Moses without all question commeth from heauen as an Angell of God.

5 Nowe these so many and so notable miracles that he recounteth, are even as manie establisments of the lawe that he deliered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was carried in a cloud vp into the mountain: that there even to the fourtieth day he continued without companie of men: that in the verry publishing of the lawe his face did shine as it were becafe with sunne beames: that lightenings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard ech where in the ayre: that a trumpeter founded being not blownen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude set betweene, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so miraculously revenged with the horrible destruction of Chor, Dathan, and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke striken with a rodde did by and by powre forth a riuier: that at his prayer it rayned Manna from heauen: did not God herein commend him from heauen as an vndoubted Prophet? If any man obiect against mee, that I take these things as confessed, which are not out of controversie, it is easie to aunswere this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these things, what place was there to saye before those witnesses that had them selues scene the thinges done? It is likely forsooth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infideltie, stubbornes, vnhospitalitie, and other sinnes, would haue boasted that his doctrine was establisshed in their owne sight with such miracles, which in deede they never sawe.

6 For this is also worthie to be noted, so oft as hee telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiously ioyneth such thinges as might stirre the whole people to crye out against him, if there had beene neuer so little occasion. Whereby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were ever more than sufficiently convinced by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlie known, than that y prophanne could denye that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them an other cauillation, saying, that they were done by Magickal artes and forcerie. But what likelye proffes haue they to accuse him for a forcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, that he commandeth to stone him to death, that doth but ask counsel of forcerers and faithsayers? Truely no such deceiuer with his juggling castes, but that he studieth to amase the minde of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth onely execute those thinges that God hath appointed, D. he

he doth sufficiently wipe away all blottes of thinking evil of him. Now if the things themselves be considered, what enchantment could bring to passe that Manna daily raining from heaven, should suffice to feede the people? and if any man kept in store more than his just measure; by the very rotting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great proues God suffered his feruant to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudly and impudently make insurrections, sometime divers of them conspiring among themselves went about to overthrow the holy seruant of God: howe could he haue begiled their furor with illusions? And the end that followed plainly sheweth, that by this means his doctrine was established to continue to the end of all ages.

7 Moreover where he assigneth the chiefe governement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarche Iacob, who can denie that this was done by spirit of prophecie, especially if wey in consideration the thing is selfe, how in comming to passe it proved true? Imagine Mofes to haue bin the first author of this prophecie: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed foure hundred yeares wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was conserate king, it seemed that the kingdom should rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When Dauid was appointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritance of the kingdom should be changed? who would he have looked that there should have come a king out of the base house of a headman? And when there were in the same house seven brethren, who would have said that that honour should light upon the yongest? By what means came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this appointment was governed by any arte, tragedy or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heauenly prophecie? Likewihe thoe things that Mofes aforespeaketh, albeit darkely, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the covenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeares after, doe they not make it plaine that he spake by the inspiration of God? I overskip his other tellings aforehand of things, which do shew evidently favour of the revelation of God, that all men that haue their sound wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that spake. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleare looking glasse, wherein God evidently appeareth.

8 But in the other Prophets the same is yet also much more plainly seene. I will choose out onely a fewe examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esaie the kingdom of Iuda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defense, then did Esaie prophecie of the destruction of the city and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine enough of the instant of God, to tel long before of such things as at that time seemed false, and afterwards proved true: yet those prophecies that he uttered concerning their deliverance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whome the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than an hundred... dred yeares from the time that words evidently shew, that the things that Efaie speaketh , are the undoubted oracles of God, and not the conicetures of men? Againe, when Ieremie a little before that the people were caried away, did determine the end of the captuvtie within threecore and ten yeeres, and promised returne and libertie, muft it not needes be that his tongue was governed by the spirit of God? What shamelesse fhall it be to deny, that the credeite of the Prophets was stabilishd by such proouces , and that the same thing was fulfilled in deede, which they themselfes doe report to make their sayings to be belieued? Beholde, the former things are come to passe, and newe things doe

I declare: before they come forth, I tell you of them. I leaue to speake how Hieremie and Exechiel being so farre alunder, yet prophecting both at one time, they doe agreeed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endy-ted the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of sixe hundred yeeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an historie of things alreadie done and commonly knowen? These things if godly men haue well considered, they shalbe sufficiently well furnishd, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine prooue hereof is too cleare to be subiect to any caulliagions at all.

9 I know what some learned men do prate in corners, to shew the quickness of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they demaunde, who hath assured vs that these things which are read vnder title of their names , were euer written by Moses and the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardie to moue this question, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero:

who woulde not say, that such madnesse were worthie to bee corrected with strokes and stripes? The lawe of Moses hath beene marucilously prefered, rather by heauenly prouidence than by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priestes it laie buried a little while : yet since the time that the godly King Josias found it , it hath fiel by continuall succession from age to age beene vld in the handes of men. Neither did Josias bring it forth as an vnknowen or newe thing, but such a thing as had beene euer commonly published,and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The original booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records.

Only this had happened, that the Priestes had caffed to publish the law according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselfes had negleeted their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renued. They that had David in their handes,knewe they not of Moses? But to speake of them all

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of.

At once, it is most certain that their writings came to posterity none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may term it) by continuall orderly course of yeres delivered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, & partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

10. As for that which they obseruent out of the historie of the Machabees; to minish the credit of Scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be devised more fit to stablil the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon them selues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (lay they) commannded all the bookees to be burned, whence are come these copies that wee now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so soone be made? It is evident, that after the cruelie appeased they were immediately abroade againe, and were without controverter knowne to be the same of all godly men, that having beene brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly knowe them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were confined together, did infallibly triumph with reproches vpon the Iewes, yet never was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookees. For whatsoever they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they think Moyses to be the author of it. What then do these praters else, but bewraye their owne more than doggish wrouudnesse, while they falsely saye, that these bookees are changed, and newe put in their places, whose sacred antiquity is approved by conuent of all histories? But to spend no more labour vainely in confuting such foolish caullations: let vs rather hereby consider howe great a care God had for the preseruation of his worde, when beyond the hope of all men, he saved it from the outrage of the most cruel tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endued the godly pristes and other with so great constancie, that they stucke not to redeeme this booke, even with losse of their life if neede were, & so to convey it ouer to posteritie: that he disappointed the narrow search of so many gournours & fouldiers. Who can but acknowledge the notable & miraculous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to have beene vterly destroyed, by and by came abroade againe as fully restored, and that with a great deale more honor? For by and by followed the translating of them into Greeke, to publish them throughout the world. And not in this onely appeared the miraculous working, that God preferred the tables of his couenant from the blody proclamationes of Antiochus: but also to that manifold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime wore to a few & wasted, & last of all, brought in maner to vitter destruction, yet they remained stil safe & extant. The Hebrue tongue lay not only vnesteemed, but almost vnknown. And surely had not been Gods pleasure to haue his religion prouided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Iewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarmed from the naturall vs of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophets that liued in that age, which is therefore worthie to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquity of the lawe and the Prophets is the more plainly perceiued. And by whom

hath God preferred for vs the doctrine of salvation contained in the law and the Prophets, to the ende that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed: even by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, the Iewes whom Saint Augustine doeth therefore worthyly call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian church, because they have ministred vnto vs that thing, to reade whereof, themselves have no vfe.

11 Now if we come to the newe Testament, with howe sound pillers is the trueth thereof vpholden? The three Evangeliftes write the historie in bafe and simple speache. Many proud men doe loath that simplicitie, because they take no heed to the chiefe points of doctrine therein, whereby it were carie to gather, that they entertain heavenly mysteries above mans capaci-tie. Surely whooeuer haue but one droppe of honest flame will be affh-med if they read the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly comprised by these three Evangeliftes, do easely deliver their writing from all contempt. But John thundering from an high, tho whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubborneffe more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come forth all these sharpnosed faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them read Johns Gospel: Wil they or no, they shal there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishtenesse, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter & Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blind, yet the verie heavenly majestie in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doeth sufficiently aduanceth their doctrine above the world, that Mathew being before all giuen to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter & John brought vp in their fither boates, al groffe vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deli-uer to other. Paul, not onely from a professed, but also from a cruell & bloudie enimie converted to a newe man, with foudaine and vnhopetous chaunge dothe, that being compelled by heavenly authoritie, he nowe maintayneth that doctrine, which before hee had fought against. Nowe let these dogges denye, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredite the historie: yet stil the trueth it self openly cryeth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the raskall people, soddenly began so gloriously to entreat of heavenly mysteries.

12 There be yet also furthermore many verie good reasons, why the consent of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the willes of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And that howso-uer Sathan with all the worlde hath travailed by maruellous meanes, either to oppresse it, or overthrowe it, or utterly to blotte & deface it out of mens remembranc, yet ever stil like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained invincible. For there hath not lightly bin in old time any sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellent wit than others, but he hath bent

No small estimation groweth to the scripture, of the generall and continuall agreement of men in yelding consent & credt therunto be considered.

his force against this Scripture: yet they all have nothing prevailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, & yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it have resisted being so mightily on each side assailed, if it had had none other defence but manes? Yea, rather it is hereby proved, that it came from God himselfe, that all the travailes of men striving against it, yet it hath of her owne power stilled vp. Befide that, not one citie alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receive & embrace it: but so farre as the world extendeth in length & breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of divers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so divers and disagreeing in manner in all things else, ought much to move vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heauenly maieftie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I meant of them all, but onely of those, with whom as with lightes it pleased God to have his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assurrednesse of minde ought wee to submit vs to that doctrine which wee see established and witnessed with the bloud of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldly without feare, yea and with great cheerfulness to die for it: how should it then come to passe, that wee, hauing it conveyed to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and unmoveable persuasion take holde of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath beene sealed with the bloud of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffered death to beare witness of their faith: and not of a frantike diſtemperance of braine, as sometime the erronious spirites are wont to doe, but with a firme and constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maieſtie, not only ascertained vnto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtiles of cauellers, yet be they such as be not of themselves sufficiently auayable to bring ftedfast credite vnto it, vntill the heavenly father discloſing therein his maieſtie, doeth bring the reverence thereof out of al controverſie. Wherefore then only the scripture hath suffice to the knowledge of God that bringeth salvation, when the solene thereof shall be grounded vpon the inward persuation of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as second helps of our weakeenesse they follow that cheefe and highest testimonie. But they do fondly that will haue it persuaded by proove to the vnfaithfull, that the scripture is the worde of God, which cannot be known but by faith. For good reason therefore doeth Augustine giue warning, that godlinesse & peace of minde ought to goe before, to make a man understande somewhat of so great matters.

That those fanatical men, which forsaking Scripture, retort vnto revelation, do overthrow all the principles of godliness.

Nowe
Now they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wrote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with error, as to be carried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine gidie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirit, both themselues doe forsake all reading, and also doe fororne their simplicitie which still follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine knowe of these men, what spirit that is by whole inspiration they are carried vp so high, that they dare despite the doctrine of the scriptures as childish and bafe. For if they answere that it is the spirit of Christ, then such carelesnesse is worthie to be laughed at. For I think they wil grant, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitie Church were lightned with none other spiritie. But none of them did learne of that spirtie to despise the worde of God: but rather every one was mooued more to reuere it, as their writings doe most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Efaie. For where hee sayeth: My spiritie that is vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thymouth, shall not depart out of thymouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doeth not binde the olde people to the outwarde doctrine, as though they were set to learne to spelle, but rather he teacheth, that this shal be the true and perfect felicitie of the newe church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shal ne lawtie be led by the voice of God, than by the spiritie of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewde men with wicked sacrilege doe feuer asunder those things that the Prophet hath joyned with an immoiable knot. Moreover, Paul being rauished vp into the third heaven, yet ceaseth not to goe forward in the doctrine of the lawe and the Prophets, even so as he exhorteeth Timothie, a doctour of singular excellencie to apply reading. And worthie is that commendation to be remembred, wherewith he setteth forth the scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprove, that the seruaunts of God may be made perfect. How dulleish a madnesse is is to faine, that the vse of Scripture is but transtorie, and laieth but for a while: which in deede guideth the children of God euon to the last ende? Againe, I would haue them aunswere me this: whether they haue tasted of another spiritie than that, which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not carried with such giddiness, that they dare so boaste. But what manner of spiritie did he speake of in his promise? euon that spiritie which should not speake of it self, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those things, which he the Lord elehim selue had taught by his worde. It is not therefore the office of the spiritie, which is promised us, to faine newe and vnheard, of revelations, or to coyne a newe kind of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospel, but to scale in our mindes the selue same doctrine that is commendated vnto vs by the Gospel.

2. Whereby we plainly understand, that we ought right studiefully to apply the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we lift to take any vse and fruite of the spiritie of God. As also Peter praieth their diligence that are heedfull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to have given place after the rising of the light of the Gospel. On the other side, if any spirit leaving the wisdom of the word of God doth thrust into vs an other doctrine, that the same spirit ought rightfully to be suspected of vanity and lying. For what? When Satan transmeteth himselfe into an angel of light, what credite shall the holy Ghost have among vs, if it be not severally known by some assured marke? And truly it hath beene plainly pointed out into vs by the worde of the Lord, but that these miserable men doe willingoly couer to erre to their owne destruction, while they seek a spirit rather from themselves than from him. But (saye they) it is dishonorable, that the spirit of God, whom all things ought to obey, should be subject to the Scripture. As if this were a dishonor to the holy Ghost to be every where egall and like to itselfe, to agree with it selfe in all things, and no where to varie. In deede, if it were to be tryed by the rule either of men, or of Angels, or any other rule whatsoever, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if ye lift it to term it, into bondage. But when it is compared with itselfe, when it is considered in itselfe, who can therefore saye, that there is any wrong done into it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleasure to have his majestie established. It ought to content vs so one as he entret into vs. But left under his name the spirit of Satan should crepe in, hee will haue vs to knowe him by that image of himselfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. Hee is the author of the Scriptures: hee cannot be diuers and vnlike himselfe. Therefore it must needes be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed himselfe therein. This is no dishonor into him, vnlesse perhaps we count it honorable to swarue and go out of kind from himselfe.

3 Whereas they caull that we rest upon the letter that slayeth, herein they suffer punishment for despising the Scripture. For it is plain enough that Paul there contended against the false Apostles, which commending the lawe without Christ did call away the people from the benefite of the newe Testament, wherein the Lorde doeth covenent that he will graue his Lawe within the bowels of the faithfull, & write it in their hearts. The letter therefore is dead, & the law of the Lorde killete the readers of it, when it is feuered from the grace of Christ, and not touching the heart, only foundeth in the ears. But if it be effectually printed in our hearts by the holy Ghost, if it present Christ into vs: then is it the worde of life, converting soules, giving wedome to litle ones, &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the ministry of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so stick fast in his truth which he hath expressed in the scriptures, that then onely he putteth forth and displayeth his force, when the Scripture hath her due reuerence and dignitie. And it disagreeeth not herewith which I before sayd, that the worde itselfe is not much assured into vs, vnlesse it be confirmed by the witnesse of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuell knot the Lorde hath coupled togethuer the assurance of his worde and of his spirit, so that perfect reuerence to the worde doth then settle in our minds when the holy Ghost shineth upon vs to make vs therein behold the face of God.
God: and on the other side without all fear of being deceived wee doe embrace the holy Ghost, when we reknowledge him in his own image, that is, in his worde. Thus it is undoubtedly: God brought not abroad his worde among men for a sodaine sheue, meaning at the comming of his spirit by & by to take it away againe, but he after sent the same spirit with whose power he had distributed his worde, to make an ende of his worke with effectuall confirmation of his worde. In this Chrift opened the mindes of the two discipes, not that they should cast away the Scriptures and waxe wife of themselues, but that they should understand the Scriptures. Likewise Paul when he exhorte the Thessalonians not to extinguih the spirit, doth not carry them vp on high to vaine speculations without the worde, but by and by saweth further, that prophecies are not to be despised: whereby without doubt is meant, that the light of the spirit is choked vp so soone as prophecies come to be despised. What say these proudly swelling men, rausified with the spirit, to these things, which reckon this onely to be an excellent illumination, when carelessly forsaking and saying farewell to the worde of God, they both boldly and rashly doe take holde of all that they have conceived in their sleepe? Truely, a farre other sobriete becommeth the children of God: which as they see that without the spirit of God they are voide of all light of truth, so doe they knowe that the worde is the instrument wherewith the Lorde distributeth to the faithfull the light of his spirit. For they knowe none other spirit but that which dwelt and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the worde,

That the Scripture, to correct all superstitioin, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

By T because we have shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is somewhat plainly set forth, is yet more familiarly and plainly declared in the worde: now is it good to consider, whether the Lorde shewes himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his worke. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point into it, whereby the godly mindes being admonished, may know what is chiefly to be searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I doe not yet touch the peculiar convent, whereby God severed the ftocke of Abraham from other nations. For euen then he appeared the redeemer in receiuing to his children by free adoption those that before were enemies. But wee are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creation of the worlde, and ascended not to Christ the mediatour. And although by and by it shal be good to alleadge certaine places out of the newe Testament, forasmuch as euen out of it both the power of God the Creator and his prouidence in preferring of the first nature is approv'd, yet I warne the readers before, what is now my purpose to doe, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds.

So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heaven and earth doeth gouerne the worlde by him created. Every where is renowned both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his severitie, which shewe him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doings, specially where his sufference nothing prevents with the obstinate.

2. In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions, wherein his natural face is as in an image represented to be seen. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to understand of God. The Lorde (sayeth he) the Lorde, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keept mercie vnto thousands, which takest away iniquitie & wicked doings, before whome the innocent shall not be innocent, which renderst the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twife repeating of that honorable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feeling, than in an empty & supernaturall speculation. And here we do heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heaven and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercy, iudgement and trueth. For might and power are conteined vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the Prophets fet him forth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heape vp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalme suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened vs, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceive God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde. In Ieremia where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. He that glorieth, sayeth he, let him glorie in this that he knoweth me to be the Lorde that doth mercy, iustice, & iudgement on the earth. Surely, these three things are very necessarie for vs to know mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: iudgement, which is daily executed vpon evil doers, & more greuoues is prepar'd for them to eternal destruction: iustice, whereby the faithfull are preferued & most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiv'd, the prophesie faith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou maist glorie in God. And yet here are not omitted either his trueth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is here required of his iustice, mercy and judgement, vnlesse it did redt vpon his vnmoveable trueth? And how should we beleue that he doth gouerne the earth with iustice and judgement, but understanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodnesse? If then all his waies be mercie, iudgement and iustice, in them must holinesse also needs be scene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge ledge of God that is set foorth vnfo the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth emprinted in his creatures, that is to saye it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the end wee may learne first to honour hym with perfect innocencie of life and vnfailed obedience, and then to hang altogether vnpon his goodnesse.

3 But here I meane to gather a summe of general doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the ende to direct vs to the true God, doth expressly exclude and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath beene corrupted. True it is in deede that the name of one God was euery where known & renowned. For euyn they that worshipped a great number of Gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Tertullian the Martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the Monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engraven in the hearts of al men. The same thing also doth Tertullian proye by the common phrase of speach. But for asmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drownen or fallen to faile forges deuises, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that euery they naturally vnderstoode of the being but one God, auayled no further, but to make them inexcusable. For euyn the wisest of them doe plainly shewe the wandering error of their minde, when they vppon some god to affift them, and so in their prayers do call vpncertaine gods. Moreouer in this that they imagined God to haue many natures, although they thought somewhat lesse absurdly than the rude people did of Inpiers, Mercuery, Venus, Minerva, and other: yet were they not free from the deceites of Satan, and as wee haue alreadie sayde elsewhere, whatsoever wayes of escape the Philosophers haue suttley inuented, they cannot purge themselves of rebellion, but that they all haue corrupted the trueith of God. For this reason Habacuc after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admitt him to be any other than such as he had disclosed himselfe by his worde.

That it is unlawful to attribute unto God a visible forme, and that generally they forfaie God, so many as do erect to themselves any images.

BVT as the Scripture prooviding for the rude and grosse wit of man, vseth to speake after the common manner: so when it meanyth to make severally known the true God from the faile gods, it chiefly compareth him with idoles: not that it doth allowe these inventions that are more suttley and finly taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlly to disclose the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madness in seeking God so long as they cleaue every one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusive definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought al that maner of Howsoever the name of one God was known among the Gentiles, their knowledge of him hath beene alwaies so corrupted, that the scripture directing to the true God, giveth special warning of theirs as faile.

of godhead, that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the only convenient wittes of himselfe. In the meanes time, sith this brutish grossenesse hath possessed the whole world, to couter visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselves gods of timber, stone, gold, silver, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to holde this principle, that with wicked falshood the glorie of God is corrupted, so oft as any shape is faine to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glorie of his deitie to himselfe alone, meaning to teach vs what maner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediately: Thou shalt make thee no graven image, nor any similitude, in which wordes he restraineath our libertie, that we attempt not to represent him with any visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the formes wherewith of long time before superstition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sunne, yea, and fo many starrs as the foolish nations sawe in the skie, so many gods they fained them. And scarce was there any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of god. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser then the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meete to be vfed, but without any exception he receiveth all images, pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to have God nearest vnto them.

This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which he ioyhneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou hearest a voice, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take heed to thy selfe, least peradventure thou be deceived and make to thy selfe any likenesse, &c. We see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfeit shapes, that wee may knowe that they forfake God whose ever doe couter to have visible formes of him. Of the Prophets only Esay shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the majestie of God is defiled when he is bodily represented in any likenesse.

fond cauillation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternal being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Atheniennes when he confuted their error in counterfaiting a shape of God.

3 God in deede, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath gien a presence of his godhead, so as he was faide to be beholde face to face, but all these signes that euer he shewed, did aptly serve for meanes to teache, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloude and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heauenly glorie, yet did they as it were bridle and restraine the minde of men, that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore, not Moses himselfe, to whome God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but received this aunswer, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghoft appeared vnder the likenes of a Dove, but thin he immediately vanished away, who doeth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleue him to be an invisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the reeuiling that was to be made of him in Chrift. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselues a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercy seate wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the lawe, was so made, as it might teache that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens minde are carried beyond themselves with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their winges stretched abroad did couer it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set farre inwaerde, did of itselfe sufficiently kepe it secret. Therefore it is verie plaine that they be verie made, that goe about to defende the images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meane these little images, but to shewe that images are not meeete to represent the mysteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpole, that huying the mercy seate with their wings, they should not onely kepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it, that the Prophets described the Seraphins shewed them in a vision, with their face vncouered: whereby they signifie, that so great is the brightnesse of the glorie of God, that the Angels themselues are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly judge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom wee now speake, pertained onely to the olde manner of introduction, as it were of children, vfed in the lawe. So to drawe them nowe for an example to our age, is an abfurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudiments were appointed. And it is much shame,

Although God have used to declare the presence of his godhead by corporall signes, yet even them be hath still vnder somenote to shew that hereunto wee should not presume to erect unto our selues a representation of that destic which we cannot comprehend. The Iewes haung such rudiments, is no argument why vve should have them because they had, much lesse worship them, which they did not. Deu. 4. 11. Exo. 33. 13. Mat. 28. 16. Exo. 25. 17.
Cap. 11. Of the knowledge of the

Of the gold's hat, and faith, that the paine writers are better expounders of the lawe of God than the Papistes are.

Psal. 115.4 & 35.15. The statue of idols are make,

[...] they are no gods that haue a golden or silver image: and hee taketh it for confessed truthe, that it is a foolish fained inuention whatsoeuer we conceiue of our owne sense concerning God. Hee nameth rather gold and silver, than clay or stone, that the beauty or the price should not serue to bring a reverence to idols.

Horat. germ. 1. Sat. 3.

I was sometime a fag tree log, a blocke that serv'd for nought;

The workman doubteth what of me was fittest to be wrought;

A fowre to set upon, or els a Priap God to be.

As length he thought the better was a God to make of me.

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner every moment, by his workmanship shall convyue the name and honour of God to a dead stock. But as much as Epicure in scoffingly resting hath car'd for no religion, let vs leaue the tauntes of him and such as he is, and let the rebukiing of the Prophet pricke vs, or rather thrust vs through where he faith, that they are too much beastyly witted that with one self piece of wood do make a fire and warme themselves, doe heat the oven to bake bread, doe rost or seethe flesh, & do make them a God before which they fall down humble to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also reproch them that they haue not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse convenient than to bring god to the measure of five foote, which is abouve all measure & incomprehensible.

And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custome sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreouer hold in mind, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase phrase of speach, that they are the worke of mens hand which want the authoritie of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshiping that men do use of themselues are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madenesse of them that therefore are endued with understanding, that they should know that all things are moued with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead & fencelesse. But because the corruption of nature carieth as wel all nations, as eac man privately to so great madnes, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them, and so many as truft in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond subtletie of the Greekes is confuted. For they thynke they are well dischargd if they graue not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not onely to be made by the grauer, but also to be counterfaite by any other workeman, because such counterfauting is euil and to the dishonor of his maiestie.

5 I knowe that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens booke. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregorie had beene taught, he would never so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly faith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoever men learen by images concerning God. If any man take exception, & say that the Prophets reprove them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true, But I addde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemn that thing wholy which the Papiftes take for an assured principle, that images are in steeed of bookees. For they doe in comparifon set images against God as things DIRECTLY contrarie, and such as noer can agree togethier. This compar-ifon I say is made in those places which I haue allaged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Iewes did worship, it is amisse and falsely done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceived, that thereby seekes for knowledge of God. Finally, if we were not true that it is a deceitful and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I winne of them when we fewe that it is vanitie and lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehearse words for worde that which the Prophets haue taught.

6 Let be read what Laflantius and Eusebius haue writen of this matter, which stiche not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine; which without doute pronounceth that it is vnlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet sayeth he none other thing but the same which many yeres before was decreed by the Elbertrine Councell, whereof this is the xxxvii Chapter. It is ordained that no pictures be had in the Church

Cap. II. Of the knowledge of

2. Hæver if the Papitifes haue any shuts, let them no more vfe this shift to ray that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I graunt them so much, yet should they not much get thereby for defense of their idols. What monsters they thrill in, in the place of God, is well known. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot & uncleanness, whereunto if any would fashion himselfe, he were worthie to be beaten with staves? Surely, the brothelhouses can shewe harlots more chastely and soberly attired, than their temples shewe images of these whom they would haue called virgins. Even as vncomely arraye gie them to the Martyrs. Let them therefore fashion their idols at least to some honest shew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lye in saying, that they are the bookes of some holinesse. But if it were so, yet then would we aunswere, that this is not the right way to teach faithful people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with farre other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: wherunto they shew themselves to haue a minde not verie heedsfull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papitifes call ley and unlearned men whose vnskilfulnes may beare to be taught onely by images? forsooth euery those whom the Lorde knowledge for his disciples, to whom he vouchfaeth to reveale the heauenly wifedome, whom he will eth to be instructed with the whose holy mysteries of his kingdom. I graunt in deed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I pray you groweth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause, that they which had the cure of churches gau to over their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dumme. Paul testifieth... that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospel, painted out in a manner crucified before our eyes. To what purpose then were it to have commonly set vp in churches so many crosse of wood, stone, siluer and gold, if this were wel & faithfully beaten into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curse vpon the crosse, to cleanse our sinnes with the sacrifice of his bodie, and to wash them away with his bloud, and finally to reconcile vs to God the father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosse of wood or stone. For perhaps the couterous do set their mindes and eyes faster vpon the golden & siluer crosse, than vpon any wordes of God.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by comon consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of wifedome, that they were the first authors of them, which gaue this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memorie. And truly I graunt that this euill custome was verie ancient, & I deny not that it was the fierbrand wherwith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry, did more & more burne therein. Yet do I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischiefe. For it appeareth by Moses that images were used before that this curiositie in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in vs. When he telleth that Rachel had stolen her fathers idols, he speaketh it as of a comon fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continual worship of idols. After the generall floud, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passe not many yeres but that men according to their own luft faigned them gods. And it is like that the holy Patriarch yet liuing, his childrens children were giuen to idolatry, so that to his bitter griefe he sawe the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord haue had but late purged with so horrible judgement. For

There & Nachor even before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Iose testifieth. Seing the generation of Sem soone swarue, what shal we judge of the posteritie of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride & rash boldnes, presumeth to imagin God according to her owne conceit: & as it is possessd with dulnes, yea, ouerwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceieth vanitie & a fond fantasie in stead of God. And in these euils is added a new mischiefe, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a god as he inwardly conceieth. Thus the mind begetteth the idol, & the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites proueth that this was the beginning of idolatry, that me do not beleue that God is among them, vnlesse he shewe himselfe carnally present. We know not (said they) what is become of this Moses: make vs gods that may go before vs. They knewe that there was a God whose power they had had experience of so many miracles; but they did not beleue that he wasacie vnto them, vnlesse they did see with their eyes a corporall representation of his face to be a witness vnto them of the God that governed them. Their mindes were therefore to knowe by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the fleth is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfait deuise like it self, wherein it may vaine delight as in an image of God. In a manner in al ages ages since the creation of the world, men to obey this blind desire have erect ed signs wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnal eyes.

9 After such invention forged, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought that they behelde God in images, they did also worship him in them. At length being both with mindes and eyes altogether tied thereon, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and have them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of im-gages, till they werepersuaded in some grosse opinion; not to thinke the im-gages to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selfe euyther God or a creature in the image, when thou fallest downe to worship, thou art alreadie bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath for-bidden not only images to be erected that are made to express a likenesse of him, but also anie titles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soon as they have forged a visible forme for God, they also take the power of God vnto it. So beastly foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfairt him, and therefore must they needs worshippe it. Neither is there an difference whether they so cnply worship the idole, or God in y idole. This is alway idolatry, when honours due to God are giuen to an idole, ynder what colour so euer it be. And because God will not bee worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is giuen to idols is taken from him. Let them take hereunto that seeke for pretences to defende the abominable idolatrie, wherewith these many ages past, true religion hath bin drowned and ouerthrowne. But (sae they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes themselfes so vnadvised to forget that it was God by whose hande they had bin brought out of Egypt before they made the calfe.
Yea when Aaron saide, that those were the Gods by whom they were di-livered out of the land of Egypt, they boldly asserted, shewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God which was their deliuerer,so that they might see him goe before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleued that the heathen were so grosse as to beleue, that God was no other thing but stockes and stones: For they changed their images at their pleasure, but stil they kept the same Gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, & yet they did not according to the multitude of images faigne them many Gods. Beside that they did dayly concrete newe images,yet did they not thinke that they made newe Gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine faite were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the commone aawere answered, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deitie that did in it invisibly dwel.
And they that were of some what better religion, as he callleth it, did say that they did neither worship the image, nor the spirit in it, but by the corporal image they did behelde the signe of that thing which they ought to worship?
How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the Gentiles were.
were none otherwise minded than as I have saide: being not contented with a spirittual understanding of GOD, they thought by the images hee should be more sure and nearer imprinted in them. After once that such disordered counterfaithing of God well liked them, they never ended, till daily more and more deluded with newe deceites, they imagined that God did shewe forth his power in images. And none the lesse, both the Jewes were persuaded that vnder such images they did worship the one true Lorde of heaven and earth: and likewise the Gentiles, their false gods, whom yet they faigned to dwell in heaven.

10 Whosoever deny that it hath thus bin done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lye. For, why fall they downe before them? And when they praye, why turne they towarde them as to the eares of God? For it is true that Augustine sayeth, that no man prayeth or worshippeth when he do beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in minde, that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will doe for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference betwixt the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reverence or none done to it, they honor another solemnly? Why do they wearie themselves with vowed pilgrimages to visite those images wherof they have like at home? Why do they at this day in defiance of them as it were for their religion & countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort as they would better suffer to have the one onely God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I doe not reckne vp the grosse errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and doe in manner posseffe the hearts of all men. I doe onely shewe what themselves doe confesse when they meane most of all to excuse themselves of idolatrie. We do not call them (say they) our Gods. No more did the Jewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets ech where cease not to cast in their teeth their fornication with stocks and stones, for doing no more but such things as are daily done by them that would be counted Christians, that is to say, that they carnally worshipped God in stocks and stones.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to passe it ouer, as if I knewe it not, how they seek to escape with a more subtle distinction, whereof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worship which they give to images, is Idolodulia, which is feurice of images, and not Idololatria which is worship of Images. For so they terme it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, give vnto images and pictures that worship which they call Doulia, or service. And so they thinke themselves without blame, if they be but the servants and not also the worshippers of idoles: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worship then to serve. And yet while they seek to hide them in the Greeke worde, they childishly disagree with themselves. For leaving Latreia in Greeke signifieth nothing but to worship: their saying commeth but to this effect, as if they would say, that they worship, in deed their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seek to catch them in worde: but they themselves, while

The same fault in Populis, which was in idolatrous Jewes and Gentiles.

The difference that they put between themselves and idolators, is but a shift. They are not accquited from the same sin because they give is another name.
Cap. xi. Of the knowledge of they seek to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, do bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be neuer so eloquent, they shall not attaine by their eloquence to prove vs that one selfe same thing is two sundry things. Let them (as I shewme a difference in the thing it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape guiltinesse of his fault, by giving his sinne a newe devised name: So it is a verie absurditie to thinke that these men be quit by new devised of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whose name they themselves are compelled to condemne. But so farre are they from prouing that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountain of all this whole mischief is an vnorderly counterfaunting, wherein they have struied with them while both with their owne witt they devise, & with their owne hands they frame them signifying forms to expresse them a fashion of God.

12. And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffred at all. But as much as caruing and painting are the gifts of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vied. Left these things which God hath giuen vs for his glorie & for our owne benefite, be not only defiled by disorderd abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. Wcl thinke it vnlawfull to haue God fashioned out in vsible forme, because himselfe hath forbidden it, & because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glory. And lef they thinke that it is only wee that are in this opinion, they that have beene trauiled in their works, shal find that all sound writers did alway reproue the same thing. If then be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse haue it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that only those things be painted and graven where viour eyes are capable: But that the majestie of God which is farre about the sense of our eyes, be not abused with vncomely devised shapes. Of this sort are partly histories & things done, partly images & fashions of bodies, without expressing of any things done by them. The first of these haue some vse in teaching or admonishing a man: But what profite the second can bring saue only delectation, I see not. And yet it is euident, that even such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stande vp in churches. Whereby wee may judge that they were there for vp not by discrete judgement or choice, but by foolish and vnadvised desire. I speake not how much amisse & vncomely they were for the most part fashioned, nor how licentiously PAinters and Carvers haue in this point shewed their wontonness, which thing haue alreadie touched. Only I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet do they nothing auail to teach.

nistration was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them that were the first authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swarted from that vrittynen of them that were without images. What? do we think that those holy fathers would have suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they judged profitable & good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, & much danger to lurk vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose & aduisedly reiect it, than by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in express words testify: When they be set in such places (faith he) honorably on hys, to be seen of them that pray & do sacrifice, although they want both sense & life, yet with the verry likeness that they have of liuely members & senses, they so move the weake mindes, that they seeme to live & breath, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doth worke & in maner enforce thus much, that the mind liuing within a bodie doth think that bodie to have sense, which he seeth like vnto his owne. And a little after: Images do more auale to bow downe an vnhappy soule, by this that they have mouth, eyes, ears, & fete, than to amend it by this that they neither speake, nor see, nor heare, nor go. This truely seemeth to be the cause why Iohn willed vs to beware not only of worshipping of images, but also of images themselves. And we have found it too much in experience, that through the horrible madnessse which hath heretofore possesed the worlde, to the destruction in manner of all godinesse, so soone as images be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatrie, because the folly of men cannot refraine it selfe, but it must forthwith runne on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much danger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vs temples are ordened, mee thinke it is verry ill becaminge the holinesse therof to receive any other images than these liuely & natural images, which the Lorde by his worde hath consecrate. I mean Baptisme and the Lorde's supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to be occupied & more liuely to be moued, than that they should neede any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo this is the incomparable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompened, if we beleue the Papistes.

14 I thinke I had spoken enough of this thing alreadie, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on mee to enforce me to speake more. I mean not that most famous Synode which Constatine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eight hundred yeares agoe, by the commaundement and authoritie of Irene the empe[rse]. For that Synode decreed, that images should not only be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoever I should say the authoritie of the Synode would make a great prejudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much moue me, as make it appeare to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more defirous of images than became Christians. But first let vs dispatch this. They that at this day maintaine the use of images, alledge the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defence. But there is extant a booke of confusion bearing the name of Charles the Great, which by the phrase we may gather
Of the knowledge of the Lord, but taken from our ancestors, another as from our own age. What is brought forth by the Scribes and Prophets, the light of thy countenance is sealed upon vs. Another took this similitude: As the Patriarchs vsed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men have the images of Saints in stead of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose have they writ this saying: Lorde, I haue loyed the beautie of thy house. But specially witty is the exposition of this place: As we haue heard so we feene, that God is not known by onely hearing of his worde, but also by looking vpon images. Like is the sharpe deuise of Bishop Theodore. Marucilous (faith he) is God in his Saints, And in another place: In the Saints that are in the earth, therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, so fikthie are their vsfauourie follies that it greeueth me to rehearse them.

15 When they talke of the worshipping: then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharaoh, and of the rod of Joseph, and of the piller that Jacob set vp. Albeit in this last example, they do not onely depraye the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places feeme to them marucilous strong and meece proveus. Worship his footstole. Againe, worship on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scope put the personage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greater and groffier follies? But to put al out of doubt, Theodosius Bishop of Mira, doth so carrefuly confirme by the dreams of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipping, as if he had an oracle from heauen to shewe for it. Nowe let the fauourers of images goe and prese vs with the decree of that Synode. As though those reverend fathers doe not altogether defcredit themselves, in either so childish handling, or so vngodly and owly tearing the Scriptures.

16 Nowe come I to those monstruous impieties, which it is maruel that euer they durft vomit, and twife marucilous that they were not cryed out againft with his detestation of all men. And it is good that this outragiously wickeled madness be bewrayed, that at leaft the false colour of antiquitie may be taken away, which the Papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Anemura pronounced curse against all them that will not haue images worshipping. Another imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the East part to this, that images were not worshipping. What punishment then were the Prophets, the Apostles and Martyrs worthie to suffer in whose time there were no images? They add further: If the Emperours image be met with perfume and censinge: much more is this honor due to the images of of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Ciprus, profeffeth that he reuerently embraceth images, and affirmineth that he will giue to them the same honorable maner of worship that is due to the Trinitie that giueth life. And whatsoever refuseth so to do, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Maniches and Maxionites. And, that ye should not thinke that this was the private sentence of one man, they did all assent vnto it. Yea, Iohn the Legate of the East partes being futher carried with heat, saide it were better to bring all brothehoufes into the citie, than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by confeffion of them all it was decreed, that worse than all he-relikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enimies of images. And because the play should not be without his Solemnne farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and rejoyce that hauing the image of Christ do offer Sacrifice vnto it. Where is nowe the distinction of Laria and Dulia, wherewith they are wont to seeke to blinde the eyes both of God and men? For the counsell without any exception doth giue euery as much vnto images as vnto the loving God himselfe.

That God is severally diercnd from idols, that he may bee evely and wholly worshipped.

We saide in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, & by the way wee touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shal be in other places more largely set foorth. Nowe I doe but shortly repeate, that fo oft as the Scripture affirmineth that there is but one God, it striueth not for the bare name of God, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the godhead, be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doeth differ from superflition. Ensebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway euery the blind themselues groping in darkenesse haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God be not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly & well deriueth from relegere, to record, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre fet, that good worshipers did often record & diligently wey what was the trueth. I rather thinke that that name is fet as a contrary to wandering libertie, because the greater part of the world vnadvisedly taketh hold of that which they first meete withall, and flyeth about hither and thither: but true godlinesse, to the ende it may fande in stedfast state, Religie, that is to fay, doeth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Like as I thinke superflition to haue her name hereof, that not being contented, with the maner & order prescribed, she heapeth vp together in superfluous number of vaine things. But to leave the words, it hath alway bin agreed by the consent of al ages, that religion is with falle errours corrupted & peruereted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fonde colour whichy superstitious do pretend, when with vniferete zeale they giue them selves leave to doe all things. And altho thus this confession found in the mouthes.

mouthes of all men: yet herein a shamefull ignorance bewrayeth it selfe, that neither they cleave to the one God, nor have any regard of order in the worshipping of him, as we have already shewed. But God, to sake his own right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is ielous, and that he will be a seuerre re-uenger if he be mingled with any fained god. And then he setteth forth the lawful manner of worshipping, to holde mankind in obedience. He contei-neth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithful vnto him selfe that he onely may be their lawmaker: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde Of the law, because the vses & endes thereof are manie, I wil entreat in place fit for it. Now I onely touch this point, that thereby men are bridled that they run not out of the way to wrong worships. Now, as I first said, we must hold in mind, that if all that ever properly belongeth to Godhead do not rest in God alone, he is spoyled of his honour, & his worship broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what suttleties superstitition deceieth. For it doeth not so resolt vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forsake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but while he granteth vnto him the highest place, hee setteth round about him a number of lesser gods, among whom hee divideth his offices. And so (albeit clodeyly and craftely) the glorie of the godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the old time, as well they of the Jews as of the Gentiles did set beneath the father and judge of gods a great rout of gods which shoulde every one according to his degree in common have with the highest God the government of the heaven and earth. So the Saints that in a fewe ages past departed this life, are aduauenced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vpon & honored in stead of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the majestie of God is not so much as diuided, when in deed it is a great part suppressed & extinguished, sauing that we retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme power: and in the meane time deceived with entangled suttleties, we are sundrye carried to divers gods.

2 For this purpose also was inuention the distiction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worship & service, whereby they might freely seeme to give away the honoures of God to Angels and dead men. For it is evident, that the worship which the Papistes give vnto Saints, differeth nothing in decree from the worship of God. For all aike without diereristie they worship both God and them: sauing that when they be charged with it, they winde away with this exception, that they keepe still for God the honour that is due vnto him iniolute, because they leave vnto him the worship that they call Latria. But sith the question standeth vpon the matter, & not the word, who woulde permit them so carelessley to mocke in a matter of all matters most weightie? But to let that alfo passe, yet winne they nothing by this distinction, but to prove, that they give worship to one God, & service to another. For Latria in Grecke signifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in English worship. Dulia, properly signifieth service. And yet some time in Scripture this difference is confounded together without diereristie. But graunt it be a perpetuall difference, then must wee search what both the words may mean.
Dulia is service, Latria is worship. Now no man doubteth that to serve is more than to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare to serve him whom he would not sticke to worship. So is it an uneuall dealing, to give to the Saints that which is the greater, and to leaue to God that which is the lefser. But many of the ancien authors haue vsed this distiction. What makest that matter, if all men doe perceiue it to be not only vnfit, but altogether verie fond?

3. Now leaving nice suttleties, let vs wy the matter it selfe. When Paul putteteth the Galatians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he faith that they gaue Dulia service to those that of nature were no gods. Although he name not Latria or worship, is therefore their superstition excusabell? He dooth neither therelesse condemne their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia service, than if he had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repulseth the assault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Sathan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angel reproved John, because he fell downe on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that John was so mad that he woulde giue vnto the Angell the honoure that was due onely to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is ioyned with religion sauoureth somewhat as pertaining to God; therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glorie of God. We read in deede often, that men haue beene honoured: but that was a citty honour, as I may so call it. But religion hath another rule, which so soone as it is ioyned with worship, bringeth with it a prophane abuse of the honour of God. The same may wee see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profited in godlineffe, but that he had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore, when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worship him in the stead of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to doe that which he did. And why so? but because men do ever so narrowly put difference betweene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diuersitie they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we must remember that nothing be it ever so little must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zacharie when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine words expresseth: That there shall not only be one God, but also that there shall be one name of that God, to the end that he haue nothing in common with idols. What manner of worship God requireth, we shall see in another place when it falleth in order. For it please him in his lawe to prescrib vnto men what is lawfull & right, & so to binde them to a certaine rule, that every man should not giue himselfe leane to devise what form of worship hee list. But because it is not expedient to load the readers with heaping many matters together, I wil not touche that point yet. Onely let it suffice for this time to keepe in minde, that every carrying away of the dutifull behauiours of godlineffe to any other than to God alone, is not without robbery.
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of God. And first superstition devised to give divine honours to the Sunne, or other stars or idoles; then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoiles taken from God, presumed to propheane all that were was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honor the soueraigne deitie, yet grewe in vs indifferently to offer sacrifices to spirits, lesser gods, or dead men of honour. So slipperie is the way to flyde into this fault, to make common to a number that which God severely chal-lenged to himselfe alone.

That which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spiritual essence of God, ought to suffice not only to ouerthowe the foolish errours of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtelties of prophane Philosophie. One of the olde writers seemed to have said very well, That God is all that wee do see, and all that we do not see. But by this means he hath imagined the godhead to be powred into all the partes of the world. Although God, to the intent to keep men in sober minde, speake eth but sparsely of his owne essence, yet by those two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away all grosse imaginations, and also re-preffe the presumptuous boldnes of mans mind. For surely his immeasura-ble greatness ought to make vs afraid, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: and his spiritual nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, hee filleth the earth also; yet because hee cloth our mindes by reaason of their doluses to lye still in the earth, for good cause he lisseth vs vp aboue the world, to shake off our flouth and sluggishtnes. And here falleth to grounde the errour of the Manichees, which in appointing two original beginnings, haue made the diuel in a manner equall with God. Surely, this was as much as to breake the vnite of God and restraine his vnmeasurablenes. For where they haue presumed to abuse certain testimonies: that she weth a foule ignorance, as their errour it selfe she weth a detestable madness. And the Anthropomorphites are also easily confuted, which haue imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth vs to him a mouth, eares, eyes, hands & fecte. For what man, yea though he be slenderly witted, doth not understand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such manner of speeches doe not so plainly expresse what God is, as they do applie the understanding of him to our slender capacitie. Which to doe, it behoved of necessitie that he descended a great way beneath his owne height.

2. But he also setteth out himselfe by another speciall marke, whereby he may be more neerely knowne. For he doth declareth himselfe to be but one, that he yet guehth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except except we learne, a bare and emptie name of God without any true God stieh in our braine. And that no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is divided in three persones, we must here seek a short and cale definition to deluer vs from all error. But because many do make much a doe about this worde Person, as a thing inuented by man: how abfurd it is beft first to see. The Apoftle naming the sonne the engraved forme of the Hypoftas is of his father, he undoubtedly meanes, that the Father hath some being, wherein he differeth from the sonne, For to take it for essence (as some expositours haue done, as if Christ like a pece of waxe prined with a seale did represent the substance of the father) were not only hard but also an absurditie. For fith the essence of God is single or one and indivisihle, he that in himselfe containeth it all, and not by pecemeale, or by derivation, but in whole perfection, shoulde, yet very unproperly, yea, fondly be called the engraved forme of him. But because the father although he be in his owne proprietie distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholly in his sonne, it is for good cause said, that he hath given his Hypoftasis, to be seen in him. Wherewith aptly agreeeth that which by and by followed, that he is the brightness of his glorie. Surely by the Apoftles wordes we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypoftasis in the father, that shineth in the sonne: whereby alfo agayne is easily perceived the Hypoftasis of the sonne that distinguisheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy ghost. For wee shall by and by proue him to be God, and yet he must needs be other than the father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is unlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apoftles testimonie be credited, it followed that there be in God three Hypoftases. This terme seeing the Latines have expressd with the name of Person, it were too much pride & waiwardnes to braille about fo cleare a matter. But if we lift word for word to translate, we may call it subsistence. Many in the same sense have called it substance. And the name of Person hath not bin in use among the Latines onely: but also the Grecians, perhaps to declare a consent, have taught that there are three Prophets, that is to say Persones in God. But they, whether they be Grecckes or Latines that differ one from another in the worde, doe verie well agree in the summe of the matter.

3 Nowe howsoever the heretikes barke at the name of person, or some ouermuch precise men do carpe that they like not the word tained by deuise of men: Sith they cannot get of vs to saye, that there be three, whereas every one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many gods: what unreasonable effe is this, to dislike words, which express none other thing but that which is testified & approved by the Scriptures? It were better (say they) to refraine not onely our meanings but also our words within the boundes of Scripture, than to deuise strange names that may be the beginnings of disagreeement and brawling: To doe wee tye our selues with strife about worde: so the trueth is lost in contending: so charitie is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a strange worde, which cannot be shewed in Scripture, as it is written in number of syllables: then they bind vs to a hard law, whereby is condemned an exposition that is not peeced together, with bare laying
laying together of texts of Scripture. But if they mean that to be strange, which being curiously defiued, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaply, or to no profit, which withdrew from the simplicity of the word of God, then with all my heart I embrace their sober minde. For I judge that we ought with no leffe devotion reverence to talk of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoever we do of our selves thinke of him, is foolish, and whatsoever we speake is vnfauourie. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke & speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what withstandeth vs, but that such as in scripture are to our capacitie doubtfull and entangled, we may in plainer wordes expresseth them, being yet such words as do reuerently & faithfully serve the truth of the Scripture, and be vped sparsely, modestly, and not without occasion. Of which sort there are examples enough. And whereas it shall by profe appeare that the Church of great nece was enforced to vide the names of Trinitie & Person, if any shall then finde fault with the newnesse of wordes, shall hee not be justly thought to be grieved at the light of the truth, as he that blameth only this, that the truth is made so plaine and cleare to discerne?

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vs, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that do mock it out with caullations. Which thing we have at this day too much in experience, who have great businesse in vanquishing the enemies of true and sound doctrine. With such folding and crooked winding these slippery snakes doe slide away, vnlesse they be strongly griped & holden hard when they be taken. So the olde fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meanings in exquisite plainnesse, lest they should leave any crooked byways to the wicked, to whom the dout-full constructions of wordes were hiding holes of errors. Arrius confessed Christ to be God, & the sonne of God, because he could not againsse the evident wordes of God, and as if he had beene insufficiently discharged, did faine a certaine consent with the rest. But in the mean whil he ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was create, & had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtletie out of his denne, the ancient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternall sonne of the father & consubstantial with the father. Hereat wickednes began to boile, when the Arrians began to hate & detest the name Omonson, consubstantial. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not nowe haue denied him to be consubstantial with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as brawlers and contentious, because for one little wordes sake, they were so whole in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little wordes shewed the difference betweene the true beleewing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accomplished in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, saying in disputation they were not made to shewe any maner of of distinction, but only were severall additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, he confessed, that he beleued the father God, the sonne God, the Holy ghost God. But afterward he would icably slip away with laying, that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if hee had named God, a strong God, just God, & wise God: and so he song another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the holy ghost is the father, without any order, without any distinction. The good doctors which then had care of godlines, to subdue his wickednes, cried out on the other side that they ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties. And to the end to sense themselves against the croked witten latticeties with plaine & simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truely subsist in one God, or (which came al to one effect) that there did subsist in y unitie of God a Trinity of persons.

If then the names have not bin without cause invented, we ought to take heed of them, in reiecting them we be not unjustly blamed of proude presump-tuousnes. I would to God they were buried in deede, so that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father and the Sonne, and the Holy ghost be one God; and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the Holy ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine property. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my heart to truie for bare words. For I note, that the olde fathers, which otherwise speake verie religiously of such matters, did not everywhere agree one with another, nor every one with himselfe. For what forms of speech vied by the councels doth Hilary excuse? To how great libertie doth Augustine sometime breake forth? How unlike are the Greckes to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latins ment to expressse the word Omoousion, they called it Consubstantiall, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so vying the worde substance for essence. Whereupon Hierome to Damasius sayeth, it is sa-cricele to saye, that there are three substancies in God: yet above a hundred times you hal find in Hilary, y there are three substancies in God. In y worde Hypostasis, how is Hierome accombrd? For he suspecteth that there lur-keth poyson in naming there Hypostases in God. And if a man do vse this worde in a godly sense, yet he plainly faith that it is an improper speech, if he speake vnfaithly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seeke to charge the Bishops of the Eastlands, whom hee fought to charge with an vnjust sclander. Sure this one thing he speake not verie truly, that in all pro-prane schooles, soula, essence is nothing else by hypostasis, which is prooued falle by the common and accustomed vse. Augustine is more modest & gentle, which although he say, that the worde hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latine ears, yet so far is it of, that he taketh from the Greckes their visua maner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Grecke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the sixt booke of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this end, as though he ment that he had by vnskilful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hilarius himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretikes charge, that by their wiywardnes he is compelled, to put those things in peril of the speech of De trin. 2. men, which ought to haue bin kept in the religiouines of minds plainly co-time had nothing severally proper to it selues, \textit{John} had said amisse that it was \textit{John. 1. 1}, with God. Where he forthwith addeth, that God him selfe was the same word, he calleth vs backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not be with God, but that it must rest in the Father: hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be joyned to the essence with an unseparable knot, yet hath it a special mark, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistencies, I say, that each having relation to other, is in property distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple & indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no leafe to the Sonne and the Holy Ghost: than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the speciall propertie of his her doeth discern him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper unto every of them is uncommunicable. For that which is given to the Father for a marke of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Sonne. And I mislike not the definition of \textit{Tertullian}, so that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine disposition or distribution, which yet changeth nothing of the vituice of the essence.

7 But before that I go any further, it is good that I prove the Godhead of the Sonne & of the Holy Ghost. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from another. Surely when the word of God is spoken of in the Scripture: it were a very great absurditie to imagin it only a fading and vanishing voice, which sent into the aire, commeth out of God him selfe, of which sort were the oracles given to the fathers, \& all the prophesies: when rather the word is meant to be the perpetual wisdom & abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles & prophesies proceeded. For as \textit{Peter} testifieth, no leafe did the old prophets speake with the Spirit of Christ, than did the Apostles: \& all they that after them did distribute the heavenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must understand that the Word was before all worlds begotten of the Father. And if the Spirit was of the world, whose instruments were the prophets, we do undoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth \textit{Moses} teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he seteth the word as the meane. For why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating of all his works did. Be this done: or that done: but that the unsearchable glorie of God may shiningly appeare in his images? The subtle-nosed \& babbling men do easily mocke at this, with saying that the name Word, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expounders are the Apostles, which teach that the worlds were made by the same, \& that he fusteineth them all with his mightie Word. For here we see that the Word is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eternall \& essentiel Word to the Father. And to the wife \& lover it is not darke that \textit{salomon} fayth, where he bringeth in wisdom begotten of God before all worlds, \& bearing rule in the creation of things, \& in all the workes of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, seruing but for a time; were verie solish \& vaine: whereas in deed it was Gods pleasure at that time to shewe forth his fittest \& eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secretes. To which intent also maketh that saying

John 5:17. Saying of Christ: My Father and I do work even to this day. For saying: That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. Wee gather then that the meaning of God's speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, and so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth John speak, when he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all things. For he both giueth to the Word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth unto it some thing peculiar to itself, and plainly sheweth how God in speaking was the creator of the world. Therefore as all revelations proceeding from God doe well beare the name of the worde of God, so ought we say yet to set in the highest place that substantial Worde, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subject to no alteration, abydeth alwayes one and the selfesame with God, and is God himself.

8 Here manie dogges doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, do secreteely steale from him his eter-nitie. For they say, that the Worde then began first to be, when GOD in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But verie secreteely doe they to imagine a certaine innouation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relation to his outwarde worke, began to be giuen unto him after the beginning of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heaven and earth: so doeth Godlinecse knowe or admit no name that shoulde signifie any newe thing in himselfe to haue chaunced vnfo God. For if any shoulde come to him from else where than in himselfe, then this saying of James shoulde fail, that euery good giuing and every perfect gift is from aboue, and commeth downe from the Father of lightes, with whom no variablenessee, neither shadowing by turning.
Therefore nothing is leffe to be suffered, than to faine a beginning of that Worde, which both alwaies was God, and afterwarde was creator of the world. But fully yt is forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doeth secrectly shewe, that there was no Worde in him before. Which is a most tryling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had never any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God sayde, let light be made, the power of the worde appeared and shewed it selfe: the same Worde was long before: but if a man ask howe long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe saide: Father, glorifie me with the glorie which I had with thee before the worlde was. And this thing John also left not untoucthed, because hee first sheweth that in the beginning the Worde was with God, before that he commeth to the creation of the worlde. Wee say therefore againe, that the Worde which was conceiued of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.
Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but do defer it to that place where we shall specially entreat of the redemption: yet because it ought to be certainly holden without controversie among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place will be verie fit to recite all those testimonies that prove Christ to be God. When it is said in the xv. Psalm, thy throne O God is for ever and ever: the Jewes do calll and say, that the name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and souveraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternal throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternal Lord. Againe, this title is given to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shall be for a God to Pharaoh. Some read it in the Genitive case which is verie foolish. I grant in deed that often times a thing is called Divine or of God, that is not by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not obey: in Isaiah is verie plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is a, dorned with the souveraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (sayth he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the Jewes barke againe, & turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the world to come shall call him: so that they leave this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose shoulde so many names of addition in this place be heaped upon God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorn Christ with such speciall notes as may buyde our faith upon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like sort called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer than that place of Hieremias where he sayeth, that this shall be the name whereby the seede of David shall be called Jehovah our righteousness. For where the Jewes themselves do teach, that all other names of God are but adiective names of addition, and that this onely name Jehovah which they call unspeakable is a substantiue name to expresse his essence: we gather that the Sonne is the onely and eternall God, which faith in another place that he will not give his glory to another. But here also they seeke to scape away because that Moses gave that name to the Altar that he builded: and Ezekiel gave it to the new citie Hierusalem. But who doeth not see that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the auncancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but only to testify the presence of God? For thus sayeth the Prophet: The name of the citie from that day shall be Jehovah there. And Moses faith thus: He builded an altar and called the name of it, Jehovah my exalvation. But more businesse ariseth by another place of Hieremias, where the same title is applied to Hierusalem in these wordes: this is the name whereby they shall call her Jehovah our righteousness. But this testimonie is so farre from making against the truth which we defende, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Jehovah from whom floweth righteousness, nowe he pronounceth that the Church shall so verily seele the same, sac, that shee may gloriously vs[e] the verie name it self. And so in the first place is set the fountaine and cause of righteousness, in the other the effect.

10 Nowe if this doe not satisifie the lewes, that Iehovah is so often presented in the person of an Angel, I see not with what caualitious they can mock it out. It is saide, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell challengeth to himselfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and saye, that this is spoken in respect of the Person that hee representeth; this knott is not thus loosed. For being a servant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate brede, commandeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehovah. And then hee prooueth that himselfe in deed was the same Iehovah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not onely an Angell but God. And thence came it that he sayde wee shall die because wee haue seene God. And when his wife aunswereth, if Iehovah woulde haue flame vs, hee woulde not haue receiued Sacrifice at our handes: in this hee doth confesse that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the aunswer of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, sayinge: why doest thou aske mee of my name, which is marvelous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Serueto, when hee affirmed that God never appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctours of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the Worde of God, which then as aforesaid began to execute the office of mediatur. For though hee was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betwenee God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell; yet still in the meane time hee recetned that which was his owne, to be the God of unspakeable glorie. The same thing meaneth Osea, which after he had recited the wrastling of Iacob with the Angell, faith: Iehovah the God of hosts, Iehovah, worthie of memorie is his name. Here againe Serueto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme that which Moses had said: why doest thou ask mee of my name? And the confession of the Holy Patriarch doth sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whom the full godhead was resident, when he saide: I haue seene God face to face. And for this cause Paul faith, that Christ was guyde of the people in the wildernesse. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be wayed without contention, the Angell that sent another Angell was by and by pronounced to be the God of hosts, and to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omitte innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they do not much move the lewes. For when it is said in Esaiie: Beholde, this is our God, this is Iehovah, we shall waire vpon him, and he shall saue vs, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is meant God which raiseth vp for the salvation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations rowse repeated suffer suffer it to be drawn no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer & fuller is the place of Malachie, where he promiseth that he shall come, the Lorde that was then defired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only soueraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doeth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the same God that was euery honored among the Iewes.

11 As for the Newe Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must traveall rather shortly to choose out seuerall, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediator in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth shall serve to prove his godhead. First, this is worthy to be singularly marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles doe shewe they are either alreadie performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esaiie prophesie, that the Lord of hostes shall be to the Iewes and Israelites a stumbling stone and a rock to fall upon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewhile in another place, We must all (faith he) once be brought to appeare before the judgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all tongues sweare. Seeing God in Esaiie speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deede performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selle same God, whose glory may not be withdrawn to another. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeth out of the Psalms, is euident that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Ascending on hee he hath carried captiuitie captive, meaning that such ascending was in shadowe sweere, when God in notable victorie against foreine nations did sweere forth his power, but hee declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So John testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was receeued to Esai by a vision, whereas in deede the Prophet himselfe writeth that the maieftie of God appeared vnto him. And it is euident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrews applieth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst laye the foundations of heauen and earth, &c. Againe, worship him all ye his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Psalms, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rofe vp and had mercie of Sion. It was hee that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations and ilandes. And why should John tisake to apply the maieftie of God to Christ, which in his preface had saide that the worde was alway God? Why should Paul scarce to set Christ in the judgement throne of God, having before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he sayed that hee was God blessed to the ende of worldes? And to make appeare, howe well he agreeeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be praised to the ende of worldes, then he is the same to whom in another place hee affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainely cryeth out, that he would have counted it no robberie, if he had shewed himselfe equall

Of the knowledge of equall with God, but that he willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, John goeth farther and saith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought abundantly to satisfie vs, that he is called God, specially of that witness which expressely affirmeth vnto vs, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witness is Paul, which saith thus: How many soueraine called gods, either in heaven or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne bloud purchased the church vnto himselfe: why should we imagine a second God which he himselfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protestation his owne Lord and his God, doth professe that he is that onely one God whom he had always worshipped.

12 Nowe if we see him to be his Godhead by the worke that in the Scripture are acribed vnto him, it shall thereby more evidentlie appeare. For when he saide that from the beginning he was thither working with his Father: the Iewes which were most dull in understanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceiued that he tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore as John telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not only brake the Sabbath, but also did call God his Father, making himselfe equall with God. How dull shal we see then, if we do not perceive that his Godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truely to order the world with prouindence and power, and to govern all things with the authoritie of his owne might, which the Apostle acribed vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterperteneth the gouernment of the world with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Propher: I am he, I am he, that doe away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Iewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgive sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in wordes but also proved by miracle that this power belonged vnto himselfe. We see therefore that he hath, not the ministration, but the power of forgiveness of sinnes, which the Lord faith he will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shall we say of searching, and peirding the secrete thoughts of harts? is it not the proprietie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

13 Nowe, in his miracles howe plainly and clearely doeth he appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophets as the Apostles did equall & like miracles to these that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministration disposed the gifts of God, he shewed foorth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the ende to giue glory vnto his Father. But we see for the most parte his owne power shewed vnto vs. And howe could it otherwise be, but that he was the verie author of miracles that by his owne authoritie gaue power to othet to deale miracles abrode? For the Evangellist declarethe that he gaue power to the Apostles to rase vp the dead, to heal leprosy, to cast out devils, &c. And they vsed the minis ministration thereof, that they sufficiently shewed that this power came not from elsewhere but from Christ. In the name of Jesus Christ (faith Peter) rise and walk. It is therefore no marvel if Christ alluded his miracles to confound the unbelief of the Jews; forasmuch as they were such as being done by his own power did give a most plain testimony of his godhead. If else where then in God there is no salvation, no righteousness, no life; and Christ containeth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can object against me and say, that life and salvation is poured into him by God: for it is not said that he received salvation, but that he is salvation himself. And if none be good but only God: how can he be only man, being I will not say good and just, but selfe goodness and justice? Yea, from the first beginning of the creation as the Evangelist witnesseth, in him was life: and he even then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being supported with such prooues we are bold to repose our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an ungodliness that robbeth God for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God: faith he. Beleeue then also in mee. And so doeth Paul expound those two places of Esay, Whosoever trusteth in him, shall not be put to shame. Againe, Out of the roote of Esay shall hee come that shall rise to rule peoples, in him the nations shall trust. And why should wee seeke out more testimonies of Scripture for this matter, when wee so often meete with this sentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternall life. Moreover the invocation which hangeth vpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the majestie of God, if he haue any thing at all proper to himself. For one Prophet sayeth: Whosoever calleth vpone the name of Jehovah shall be saue: and ano her sayeth, a most strong soure is the name of Jehovah: to it the righteous shall flee and hee shall be saue, but the name of Christ is calleth vpone for salvation: it followeth therefore that hee is Jehovah. As for invocation, wee haue an example of it in Stephen, when hee sayeth, Lorde Jesus receive my spirite'. Againe, in the whole Church, as A-nanius testifieth in the same booke. Lorde (sayeth he) thou knowest how great evils this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly understood, that the whole fulness of the Godhead doeth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doeth confess that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that hee preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and howe great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs, whome hee willeth to glorifie in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare sayeth that he is but a creature, of whome Hie the onely knowledge is our whole glorifie? Beside that, the salutations set before the Epistles of Paul, with the same benefits from the Sonne which they do from the Father: whereby we are taught not only that those things which the Father giueth vs do come vnto vs by his inheritance, but also by communitie of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practife is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the minde doeth behold God most present, and in maner handle him, where it feeleth itselfe to be quickened, lightned, saved, justified and sanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the same fountains we must fetch our meane of proving to conforme the Godhead of the Holy Ghost. Verie plain is the testimonie of Moses in the historic of the creation, that the spirite of God was upon the depths, or upon the unfashioned heape: because he sheweth that not only the beautie of the world that is now to be seene is preferred by the power of the Spirit, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirit was then buried in preserving that confused lump of things. And that saying of Esai cannot be caulled against, And nowe Iehovah and his Spirit hath sent mee. For hee communicateth with the Holy Ghost his chief power in lending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the divine majestie of the Holy Ghost. But our best proove, as I haue said, shalbe by familiar vse. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and such a thing as we our selves doe learne by assured experience of godlinessse. For he it is that being where poured abroad, doth sustaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heauen and in earth. And by this point he is provokd to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his lively force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the verie worke of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any present quickening: what shall we judge of him from whose power the same proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, so vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For hee searcheth the deepe secretes of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of countell. He giueth wisdome and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lord pronounceth to Moses, that it is onely his worke to do it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our justification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing soever may be thought of, because it is the Holy ghost only from whom proceeded all kind of gifts. For that sentence of Paul is right worthie to be noted. Although there be diverse gifts, and manifold and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy spirite: because he maketh him not only the original or beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these worde. One and the same spirite distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute vnto him choice of minde and will. Therefore most evidently doth Paul giue to the Holy ghost divine power, and sheweth that hee is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that wee are the temple of God, because his spirite dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed over. For whereas God so often promiseth that he will choose vs for a temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirit dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustin vere well saith: if we were commanded to make vnto the Holy ghost a temple of timber & stone because such worship is due to God only, it were a cleare argument that he is God: nowe therefore howe much clearer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our selves to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the Holy ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lyed to the Holy ghost, said that he lyed not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the Holy ghost that speakeketh. Yea, where commonly the Prophets say, that the words which they vster are the words of the Lord of hostes, Christ & the Apostles do referre them to the Holy ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true lebounah, that is, the chief author of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that he was prouoked to wrath by the stubborneffe of his people, in stede of that Esay faith that his Holy spirit was grieved. Last of all, if blaspheemie against the Holy ghost be not forgiven in this world nor in the world to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blaspheemed against the Sonne: his divine majestie is here plainly proued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an unpardonable crime. I do wittingly & of purpose omit many testimonies that the auncient writers haue vsed. They have thought it a maruellous mette place to alleage out of David: with the word of the Lord the heauens were stablished, & al the power of them with the spirit of his mouth, to prowe that the worde was no leffe the worke of the Holy ghost then of the Sonne. But for as much as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repete one thing twice: and in Esay, the spiritre of his mouth is as much to say as his word, that reason is verie weake. Therefore I thought good to touch a fewe such things as godly mindes might soundly rest upon.

16 And as God harte more plainly disclosed himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three Perions become more familiarly known. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knittheth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he therefore shall we ther that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby proueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needs thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised. And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemne protestation, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was alreadie deliuered, when he sayd: Baptise them in the name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost. Whereby it is evident that in the essence of God abide three Persones in which the one God is knoewn. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diversely to wander about, but to have regard to the one God, to be applied to him, & to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easly proved, that that if there be divers kinds of faith, there must also be many gods. Nowe whereas baptism is a Sacrament of faith: it proceedeth unto the unitie of God, because it is but one. And hereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, because wee embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What meant Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to beleue in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy ghost? Thersfore this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Worde and the Spirit are nothing els but the verie selfe essence of God. And verie foolishly did the Arrian prate, which confessing the godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would have so to be understood by the Spirit, onely the giftes of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisedome, understanding, prudence, fortitude, fear of God do proceede from him: so he onely is the spirite of wisedome, prudence, fortitude, and godlineffe. Yet is not he devided according to the distribution of his graces: but how soever they be diversely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle faith.

17 Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirit. In discussing whereof, how great religiousnes and sobrietie we ought to vse, the greatnesse of the mysterie it selfe doth admonish vs. And I verie well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzen: I can not thinke vpon the one, but by & by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I cannot severaly discern the three, but I am fodeinly druen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our minde to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may holde our thought withdrawn into soeueralties, and doeth not forthwith bring vs againe to that unitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost, do proue a true distinction, that no man should think them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his worke is diversely entitled: but yet it is a distinction, not a division. The places that wee have alreadie cited, do shewe that the Sonne hath a properitie distinct from the Father, because the Worde had not beene with God, if he had not been another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he faith, that there is an other which beareth him witness. And for this purpose makest that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreover, the Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father dyed not, nor rose again, but he that was sent by him: Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh: but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abyde to say, that then the Sonne entred into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heaven to take manhode vpon him? He was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glory with the Father. As for the distinction of the Holy

That the father is of none, the Sonne is of the father, and the Spirit is of both.

Holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he faith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shewe it to be another beside himselfe as when he promizeth that he will send an other comforter, and often in other places.

18. But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I know not whether it be expedient. In deede the old fathers are wont so to doe sometime: but withall they do confesse, that whatsoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold, least if I bring forth any thing vnfitly, it should give occasion either to the malicious to caull, or to the vnskilfull to be deceived. Yet such distinction as we have marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left unspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giv'n the beginning of working, the fountain and spring of all things: to the Sonne wisdome, counsell, and the verie disposition in the doing of things: to the Holy Ghost is assign'd power and effectuall working: And although eternitie belong vn'to the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy Ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue been without his wisdome and power, and in eternitie is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this observation of order is not vaine or superfluous, wherein the Father is recknd first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the Holy Ghost. For every mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisdome rising out of him, and last of all the power where with he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what fort the Sonne is said to be of the Father only, & the Holy Ghost both of the Father & the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the vij. Chapter to the Romanes, where the same Spirit is without difference sometime called the Spirit of Christ, & sometime of him that raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testifie that it was the Spirit of Christ wherewith the Prophets did prophesie, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

19. Now this distinction is so far off from standing against the single vnitie of God, that thereby wee may proue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one Spirit with him, & that the Holy Spirit is not a thing dueers from the Father & the Sonne. For in each Hypostasis is understood the whole substance, with this, that every one hath his owne property. The Father is whole in the Sonne, & the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth. I am in the Father, & the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiastical writers do not grant the one to be seuered from the other by any difference of essence. By these names that betoken distinction (faith Auguistine) that is ment whereby they have relation one to another, & not the verie substance whereby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, & sometime that the Sonne hath both godhead & essence of himselfe, & is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this diversitie Auguistine doth in an other place wel & plainly declare, when he saith: Christ having
Of the knowledge of respect to himself, is called God, & to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himself is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where having respect to the Sonne he is called the Father, hee is not the Sonne: & where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: & where he is called as to himself the Father, & as to himselfe the Son: it is al one God Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne without having respect to the Father, we do wel & properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betweene him & his Father, then wee rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinitie doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too suttely peereing vnto the hie mysterie, to wander abroad by many vaine speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with soberneffe, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be knowne: that is, when wee professse that wee beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, wee understande the one onely and sngle essence in which wee comprehend three Persons or Hypotheses. And therefore so oft as wee do indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no leffe the Sonne & the holy Ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is joyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction betweene the Persons. And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them, so as the beginning & originalle is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father & the Sonne, or the Holy Ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly givne to the Father. By this meanes is retaine the vvnitie of the essence, & regard is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne & of the Holy Ghost. And whereas we haue alredie seene that the Apostles do affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whome Moses and the Prophets doe testifie to be Jehovah the Lorde, wee must of necessitie alway come to the vnitie of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacrilege for vs to call the Sonne a seuerall God from the Father, because the sngle name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himselfe cannot be said to be this or that. Now, that the name of Jehovah the Lord indefinitely taken is appplied to Christ, appeareth by the words of Paul, where he faith: Therefore I haue thrife prayde the Lord, because that after he had receiued the aumsweare of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he faith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in mee. It is certaine that the name Lorde is there set for Jehovah, and therefore to restraine it to the person of the Mediator were verie fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compar eth not the Father with the Sonne. And we knowe that after the accustomed manner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly set the worde Kyrios, Lord, in stead of Jehovah. And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sense praye to the Lorde, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Joel: Whosoever calleth uppon the name of the Lorde shall be saued. But where this name is peculi arly givne to the Sonne, wee shall see that there is an other reason thereof. when we come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is enough to have in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by & by bringeth in the name of Christ. Even so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirit. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spiritual, wherein the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost be comprehended. Which is verie plaine by the Scripture. For even as there we heare God to be made a Spirit : so we do heare the Holy ghost, for so much as it is an Hypothesis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Satan, to the ende to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the divine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of Persons: And as in a maner in all ages he hath stirr'd vp wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he troubleth out of the old embers to kindle a newe fire; therefore here it is good to answere the pernicious foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath bene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to straue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we have alreadie peaceably chewed, must be rescued from the cauallations of the wicked: Albeit my chiefe traualle shall yet be apply'd to this ende, that they which giue gentle and open hearne to the word of God, may have whereupon edually to rest their foote. In this point, if any, where at all in the secrete mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, & with great moderation, and to take great heede that neither our thought nor our young proceed any further than the boundes of Gods worde doe extende. For how may the minde of man by his capacitie define the immeasurable essence of God, which never yet could certainly determine howe great is the body of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea, how may the by her own guiding attaine to discouer the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her own substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnfo God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilaris sayeth, is a consentient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knownen but by himselfe. Wee shall giue it ouer vnsto him, if we shall both conceiue him to be such as he hath open'd himselfe vnsto vs, & shall not else where search to know of him, than by his own word. There are to this ende written five homilies of Chrysostome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrained by them from babbling vnbridledly. For they have behaued themselves in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are woned in all other. By the unhappie successe of which vndiscretion, wee ought to be warned to take care that we bend our felues to travaile in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and never have in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but having his worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same Wordes: The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is verie hard to know, so doeth it bring more businesse and

With what sobernesse we ought to dispute against heresies about the mysteries of the Trinite.
Cap. 13.

comberance to some wittes than is expedient. Let them remember that the minds of men do enter into a maze when they followe their owne curiositi, and so let them suffer themselves to be ruled with the heavenly oracles, howsoever they cannot attaine the height of the mysterie.

For where as John pronounceth, that the Worde was God before the worlde was yet creat, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, & from farthest Eternitie of time, that Worde which was God was with the Father; and had his owne proper glorie with the Father, he could not be an outward or figurative shining: but it necessaryly foloweth that he was an Hypostases that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirite, but in the historic of the creation of the worlde, yet he is not there brought in as a shadowe, but an essentiall power of God, when Mofes sheweth that the vertue unshashioned lump was sustaine in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternal Spirite was always in God, when he preferred and sustained the confused matter of heaven and earth, vntill beautie and order were added vnto it. Surely hee could not yet be an image or representation of God as Servennto dreameth.

But in other points he is compelled more openly to discose his wickednesse in saying that God by his eternall purpose, appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this meanes shewe himselfe visible. For if that be true, there is no other godhead left vnto Christ, but so farre as hee is by the eternall decree of God ordained his Sonne. Moreover, hee so transformeth those imagined shapes, that he sticketh not to faine newe accidents in God. But this of all others is most abominable, that hee confusely mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the holy ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which every portion is God. And namely he sayeth, that the Spirites of the faithfull are coeternall and confubstantial with God: albeit in an other place he assigneth the substantiall Deitie, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth another like monster. For certeine leud men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednesse of Servennto, haue in deede confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which truely and properly is the one only God, informing the Sonne and the holy ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea, they forbeare not this horrible manner of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the Holy ghost, that he is the onely essentiaier or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colours that Christ is eek where called the Sonne of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometime given to the Father onely, because he is the fountaine and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpose, to make the single unitie of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception & say: If thee truely the Sonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckned the Sonne of a Person. I answer, that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediatour) and yet for explications sake we ought to haue regarde of the Person, that the name of God be not taken simply but for the Father onely. For if wee mean to be God but the Father, we plainly throwe downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so oft as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truely the God that appeared to Esaie was the true and onely God; and yet John Esa. 8, 14 affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Esaie testified...

After, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Iewes, was the onely God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the same was Christ. He that cryeth out by Esaie, I live, and to mee all kinees shall bowe, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose Iere the testimonies that the Apostle reciteth. Thou O God haile laye the foundations of heauen and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worship him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he sayeth, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this cauallation is nothing worth, that that is given to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightness of his glorie. For because in ech of these places is set the name of Jehouah, it followeth, that it is so sayd in respect that hee is God of himselfe. For if he be Jehouah, it cannot be denied that he is the same God that in another place cryeth out by Esaie: 1, I am, and beside mee there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremie: The gods that have not made the heauen and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is under the heauen. Whereas on the other side wee must needes confesse, that the Sonne of God is hee, whose Godhead is oft proued in Esaie by the creation of the world. And howe can it be that the Creator, which gueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borowe his being of another? For whocover faith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denyeth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy ghost sayeth the contrarie, naming him Jehouah. Nowe if wee graunte that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made parable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoyled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title. The essence of God, if wee beleue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essencemaker of the Sonne. And so shall the godhead of the Sonne be an abstract from the essence of God, or a deriuation of a part out of the whole. Nowe must they needes graunte by their owne priciple, that the Holy Ghost is the Spirite of the Father onely. For if hee be a deriuation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirite of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimonie of Paul, where hee maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreover, if the person of the Father be wipe out of the Trinitie, wherein shall he differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, but in this, that hee onely is God? They confesse Christ to be God, and yet they saye, hee differeth from the Father. Againe, there must be some marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true Godhead of Christ to nothing, which cannot be without essence, yea, and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnlesse hee have something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What nowe will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them anfwere if he have not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meane they doe soulie reare in sunder the essence of God.

If I that God, with whom the essence abideth, then Christ shall be a figurative God, and a God only in the name and in name but not in deed; because nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent me vnto you.

24. It is easy by many places to prove that it is false which they holde, that Io oft as there is in scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselves do allege, they foully bewraye their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatively taken, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And their objection where they say, If the Father were not only the true God, hee shou'd himselfe be his owne Father, is anwered with on: worde. It is not inconvenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wifedom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For if Christ was openly shewed in the flesh hee is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respect that he was the eternall Worde before all worlds begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke upon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to ioyne vs vnto God. And because they do so boldly exclude the Sonne from the honour of God, I would faine knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, lest perhaps they should take exception, and say, that whatsoever goodnesse was in it, it can no ftre giste. I ask whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they saye nay, then wee holde their ungodlineesse sufficiently convince: in saying yea, they confonde themselves. But whereas at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of God, that doth the more conforme our meaning. For if he it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common manner filated by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, he did admonishe them, that the goodnesse wherein hee excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath. I ask also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortal, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortal, foolish, and false? Shall not hee then be immortal, that from the beginning was life to give immortalitie to Angels? Shall not hee be wise, that is the eternall wisedome of God? Shall not the truth itselfe be true? I ask further more, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For hee claimeth this vnto himselfe, to have all knees bow before him: it followeth that hee is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himself. If they wil have that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against them selves, forasmuch as we see see, that what focuer

foever pertaineth to God is given to Christ. And their caulation hath no place, that Christ was exalted in the flesh, wherein he had beene abased, and that in respect of the flesh, all authoritie is given him in heaven & in earth: because although the majestie of king and judge extende to the whole Person of the Mediator, yet if he had not beene God openly shewed in flesh, he could not have beene aduanced to such height, but that God should have disagreed with himselfe. But this controversie Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was equall with God before he did abase himselfe ynder the shape of a servant. Nowe howe could this equalitie have stande together, vnlesse he had beene the same God whose name is Ioh and Iehovah; that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is king of all the earth and Lord of the worlds? Now howsoever they babble against it, it cannot be taken from Christ which Esaies saith in another place: He, he, is our God, for him we haue wayted, whereas in these words he describeth the comming of God the Redeemer, not onely that should bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all points restore the Church. And with their other caulation they nothing preuaile, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though we confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a daretable intenion to saye, that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this means either he should haue mo essences than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is unbegotten and unconditioned. I knowe that many quicke nosed men doe laugh at this that wee gather the distinction of Persons out of the wordes of Moses, where hee bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our Image, but yet the godly readers doe see howe vaine and fondly Moses should bring in this as a talke of diverse together, if there were not in God mo Persones than one. Nowe certaine is it, that they whome the Father spake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, yea the one onely God. Nowe therefore vnlesse they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authoritie of commanding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: it shal followe that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speach to other foreine workmen. Finally one place shall easily answere two of their objections. For whereas Christ himself pronounseth that God is a spirit, this weare not convenient to bee restraine to the Father onely, as if the Word himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirit doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worship him in spirit and truth, whereupon followeth another thing, because Christ doth vnder a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth giue the name of God to the Father, not to the entent to destroy his owne godhead, but by degrees to lift vs vp vnto it.
25 But in this they are deceived, that they dreame of certaine vndivided singular things, whereof eache haue a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentiaall God, and therefore that the essence as wel of the Sonne as of the Holy Ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his vine-dome, therefore rightfully as is aboue-said, he is counted the original and fountain of all the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsely and cauillously they ascribe vnto vs a deuise of their owne braine, as though we did faine that by derivation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is evident by our writings, that we doe not drawe the persons out of the essence, but although they be abyding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the Persons were feuered from the essence, then peraduenture their reason were like to be true. But by that meaning it should bee a Trinitie of gods and not of Persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinitie, as though we did imagine that there descend three gods out of it. And this exception growth of like foolishnesse where they say, that then the Trinitie, should be without God. For though it meete not to make vp the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. Wee say therefore, that the godhead is absolutely of itselfe. Whereby wee graunt that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as hee is the Sonne, wee say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in olde time haue spoken of the Trinitie, haue only applied this name to the Persons, for so much as it were not onely an absurde error but also a grosse vngodlinesse, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will have these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, for else the partes ioyned together woulde fall in sunder, which is a fault in every distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or severall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing shoulde remaine in the Sonne but a shadowe, and the Trinitie should be nothing else, but the ioyninge of one God with two creatures.

Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of eternal life, that men beleeue in thee the one true God, and Jesus Christ whomc thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediator, he keepeth the degree that is meane betwenee God and men: and yet is not his maieftie thereby diminished. For though he abased himself, yet he left not with the Father his glorie that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebreues, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he fayeth not to affirmeth withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, under this name of God is comprehended the Godhead which is his also. So when he sayd to the Apostles: It is profitable that I goe vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: Hee gueth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of godhead to be as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because having obtained the heavenly glorie, he gathereth together the faithful to the partaking of it. He setteth his father in the higher degree, insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightness that appeareth in heauen, differeth from that measure of glorie that was seen in him being clothed with flesh. After like manner in another place Paul faith: that Christ shall yeeld vp the kindome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more aburde than to take away eternall continuance from the godhead of Christ. If he shall never cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that under the name of the Father is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surelly therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that lifting vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vp vs vnto himselfe, insomuch as he is all one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawful nor right so exclusively to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, John doeth for this cause affirmeth that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he refeth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of newe Gods doe meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they soorth with exclude him from the godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but hee that is the one God: or as though the godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

Whereas they heap vp many places out of Irenaeus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to have considered, that then the holy man had to doe in disputations with those fantastick men, that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in olde time spake by Moses and the Prophets, but that hee was I not with any thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether travaileth in this point, to make it plain that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amiss to use any other, & therefore it is no maruell if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken.
spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner nowe, whereas we are to stand against another sort of error, we may truely say that the God which in olde time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man obiect that it was the Father, our answer was in readinesse, that when we strive to defend the godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heed to this purpose of Irenæus, all that contention shall cease. And alio by the fift Chapter of the thirde booke, this whole strife is ended, where the good man standeth all vpó this point, to prove that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God, is verily the one onely God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principall point whereupon stood all his disputation, as the whole proceffe thereof doeth appeare: and specially the 46. Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not verie God in deed. Moreouer in another place he faith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were jointely called God by þ Prophets and Apostles. Afterward he defineth how Christ which is Lorde of all, and King, and God, and Judge, received power from him which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subiection, because he was humbled even to the death of the croffe. And a little after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heaven and earth, which gaue the Lawe by the hand of Mofes, and appeared to the Fathers. Nowe if any man doe prate that with Irenæus onely the Father is the God of Irael, I will turne againe vpon him that which the same writer plainly teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same: as also he applyeth unto him the Prophecie of Habacuc. God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose ferueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the living. And in the twelfth Chapter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleued God, because Christ is the maker of heaven & earth and the onely God.

28 And with no more trueth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though hee be rough sometyme and crabbed in his manner of speach, yet doeth he plainly teach the summe of that doctrine that wee defende. That is to say, whereas he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in unitive of substance, and yet that the same unitive by mysterie of orderly distribution is disposed into Trinite, that there are three, not in state, but in degree, not in substance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He faith that hee defendeth the Sonne to be a seconde next to the Father, but hee meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places hee sayeth that the Sonne is visible. But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is invisible so much as hee is the Word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his owne person, he proueth himselfe farre from that errour which we confute. And though he doeth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the nexte piece of his writing expounding himselfe, he saith, that he speaketh not exclusively in respect of the Sonne, because hee denyeth that the Sonne is any any other God beside the Father, & that therefore their sole government is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his wordes. For he disputeth against Praxeas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many gods nor the unitie torn in sunder. And because by the imagination of Praxeas Christ could not be God, but hee must also be the Father, therefore he doth laboureth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Wordes and the Spirite a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kind of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but onely theweth the disposition and order that belongeth onely to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangeth that: How many persons thinketh thou there are, O most strowarde Praxeas, but even so many as there be names? And so a little after that, they may beleue the Father and the Sonne eche in their names and Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently confuted their impudence, that seeketh to beguil the simple with colour of Tertullian authoritie.

29 And surely whosoever shall diligently compare together the writings of the old authors, shall find no other thing in Irenaeus, than that which hath beene taught by other that came after, Insine is one of the aunciente and he in all things doeth agree with vs. Yet let them obiect that hee as the rest doth, calleth the Father of Christ the onely God. The same thing doth Hilarie teach, yea, and speaketh more hardly, that the eternitie is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet is he altogether in defence of the same Faith that wee followe. Yet are they not ashamed to picke out certaine mangled sentences whereby they would perswade that Hilarie is a Patron of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will haue that to be of any authoritie, let them proue that the Apostles made a lawe for lent and such like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnauspicious than those fond trifles that are published under the name of Ignatius. Wherefore their impudence is so much lesse tolerable, that disguise themsewles with such visors to deceiue. Moreover the consent of the aunciente Fathers is plainly perceived by this, that at the counsel of Nice, Arius neuer durst allege for himselfe the authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greeks or Latines doth excuse himselfe and say, that hee dissenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken howe Augisine whom these loselles doe most hate, hath diligently searched the writings of them all, and howe reverently hee did embrace them. Truely evene in matters of least weight he vieth to shewe what compelleth him to dissent from them. And in this matter, if he had read any thing doubtfull or darke in other, he hideth it not. But the doctrine that these men strive against, he taketh it as confess'd, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath beeene without controversy receiued. And by one worde it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where he saith that in the Father is unitie, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that he then forgat himselfe? But in another place he purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, because he is of none; considering in deede wisely, that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if its beginning should not be reckned at him, the single vnitie of God cannot be conceiued. By this I truft the godly reader will perceiue that all the cauillations are confuted, wherewith Satan hath hitherto attempted to peruerit or darken the pure truch of doctrine. Finally, I truft that the whole summe of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiousitie, and not more greedily than meete is, fecke for combersome and entangled disputations. For I take not in hande to please them, that do delight in an vntemperate desire of speculation. Truely I have omitted nothing of suttle purpose that I thought to make against mee. But while I study to edifie the Church, I thought it best to leave many thinges untouched which both finallly profited, and would greeue the readers with superfluous tediousnesse. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father do alwayes beget? For as much as it is folie to faine a continuall act of begettmg, it is evident that from eternitie there have been three Persons in God.

The xiii. Chapter.

That the Scripture even in the creas ion of the world & of all things: doth by certaine marks put difference betweene the true God and fained gods.

Although E/fay doeth worthily reproch the worshippers of false gods with floutheulnesse, for that they have not learned by the verie foundations of the earth, and round compasse of the heauen, which is the true God: yet such is the dullese and grossenes of our wit, that least the faithfull shoulde fall away to the inuenions of the Gentiles, it was necessarie to haue God more expressly painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the mind of the world, which is compar'd the most tolerable description that is found among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behoueth vs more familiarily to knowe him, leaft we alwayes wauer in doubtfulnesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to haue a historie of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might reft, and fecke for none other God but him, whome Mo/es hath declared to be the maker and buylder of the world.
There is first set forth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the first originall of mankinde, and of all things.
Which knowledge is verie necessarie, not onely to confute those monfterous fables that sometime were spre'd in Egypt and other partes of the worlde, but alfo, that the beginning of the worlde once being knowne, the eternitie of God may more clearely shine forth and raueh Vs in admiration of it.
Neither ought wee to be any thing moused with that vngodly moke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to pace away, Sith he might haue made it many thousand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the worlde that nowe draweth to an ende, is not yet come to fixe thousand yeares. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because if mans minde wilt travaile to attain thereunto, it shall fail an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himself to prove the modesty of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godly old man speake, which when a wanton fellowe did in scorn demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answered, that he buylded Hell for curious fooles. Let this grasse and severe warning reprehende the wantonnesse that tickleth many, yea, and drive them to spill and hurtfull speculations. Finally, let vs remember that the same inuisible God whose wisdome, power and justice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the historie of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his lively image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are grown dimme with age, or dulled with any disease, do not discover any thing plainly, vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so, such is our weaknesses, that vnlesse the Scripture directeth vs in seeking of God, wee doe forthe with runne out into vanitie. And they that followe their owne wantonnesse, because they be nowe warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, how much it had beene better for them reuerently to receive the secrete counsels of God, than to vomite out blasphemies, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightly doth Augustine complaineth, that wrong is done to God when further cause of things is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in another place doceth wisely warne vs, that it is no lesse euill to moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For howe broad soever the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Nowe, if one should quarrel with God for that the emptinesse wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Into like madness runne they that buifie themselves about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the worlde innumerable ages sooner.

To satisfie their owne greedinesse of minde, they court to passe without the compass of the worlde, as though in so large a circuite of heauen, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their inestimable brightinesse may overwhelme all our lences: as though in sixe thousande yeares, God hath not shewed examples, in continual consideration whereof, our mindes may be exercised. Let vs therefore willingly abyde enclosed within those boundes wherewith it pleaseth God to environ vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes, that they shoule not straye abroad with libertie of wandering.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in sixe days. For by this circumstance we are withdrawen from forged intentions to the one only God that deuided his worke into sixe days, that it should not greeue vs to be occupied all the tymne of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soever wee turne them, are compelled to looke vppon the worke of God, yet see we howeickle our head is, and if any godly thoughtes doe touch vs, how soone they passe away. Here againe mans reason murmureth, as though such proceedings were disagreeing from the power of God, vs till such time as being made subject to the obedience of faith, the learne to kepe that rest whereunto the hallowing of the seventh day calleth vs. But in the verie order of things, is di-diligently to be considered, the fatherly love of God toward mankinde, in this:
that he did not creat Adam vntil he had stored the whole with all plentie of good things. For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren & emptie, if he had given him life before that there was any light, he should have seemed not so wel to provide for his commoditie. But nowe where hee first disposed the motions of the Sunne & the Planetes for the use of man, and furnished the earth, the waters and the aire with living creatures, & brought forth abundance of fruite and sufficie for food, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident householder, he shewed his maruellous bountie toward vs. If a man doe more heedfully wey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse & publisher of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I have alreadie declared, that he speaketh not there only of the bare effence of God, but also setteth foorth vnto vs his eternall Wisdom & Spirit, to the ende wee should not dreame that God is any other, then such as he will be known by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because, though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenesse of the common people, reciteth in his historie of the creation no other worke of God but such as are scene with our eyes, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, wee may easly gather, that he was the creator of them in whose service they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacitie of the people, doeth nor at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God; yet that is no caufe to the contrarie, but that we may plainly & expressly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his worke, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that, this point of doctrine is verie necessarie to be confuting of many errors. The excellen-cie of the nature of Angels hath so daased the minds of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subiect to the authoritie of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And here vpon were they fained to be gods. There rose vp also one Manicheus with his sect, which made them selves two original beginnings of things, God, & the Diuell, and to God he aligned the beginning of good things, & of things evil nature he determined the diuell to be the author. If our minds should be entangled with this errour, God should not keepe whole his glorie in the creation of the world. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which giue that vnto the diuell, do they not in a manner giue him the title of godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authoritie be grunted to the diuell, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay & withstand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees haue, that it is unlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is evil: that nothing hurteth the true Faith, which admitteth not that there

The creation of Angels is a thing necessary to be known, both because they are the most noble part of Gods worke, & also for that there concerning Angels, which can-

is anything naturally evil in the whole universalitie of the worlde, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man & the diuell, nor the sins that proceede thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and justice. Therefore to aunswer these peruerse deuies: it behoueth vs to lift vp our minde & higher than our eyes can attain to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creed God is called the creator of all things, things inuifible are expressed. Yet will we be careful to keepe the measure that the rule of godlineffe appoinnteth, leaft the readers with searching to vnderstand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being led away from the simplicitie of faith. And surely, forasmuch as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alwaye for our profit, and such things as are smally available to edifie, hee doeth either leave wholly unspeaken, or but lightly, and as it were ouerrunningly touch them: it shalbe also our dutie to be content not to knowe those things that do not profit vs.

4. That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commandements, are also his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all question. To move dout of the time and order that they were created in, should it not rather be a busie waierdnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauen were made, with all their armes, to what purpose then is it, curiously to searche, what day the other more secret armes of heauen beside the starres and planets first began to be? But, because I will not be long, let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that wee ought to keepe one rule of modestie & sobrietie, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor think, nor yet desire to knowe any other things than that hath beene taught vs by the word of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture wee continually rest vpon the searching and studying of such things as pertain to edification, & not give our selves to curiosity or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in found godlinessse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holinesse: let vs rest vpon such knowledge. Wherefore, if wee will be rightly wise, wee must leaue those vanities that idle men have taught without warrant of the worde of God, concerning the nature, degrees, and multitude of Angels. I knowe that such matters as this are by many more greedily taken hold of, & are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in daily use. But if it greeue vs not to be the scholers of Chrift, let it not greeue vs to followe that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shal it so come to passe, y being contented with his scholing, we shal not onely forbear, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Demi, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both subtly & wittily in his Hierarchie of heauen: but if a man examine it more nere, he shal finde that for the most part it is but meere babbling. But the dutifull purpoffe of a diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to establish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable.
If one should, read that booke, hee would thinke that the man were flipped downe from heauen, & did tell of things not that he had learned by heart, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was ranshod above the third heauen, hath vnterred no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawful for man to speake the secretes that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that trylyng wisedome, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs know concerning his Angels.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heavenly Spirites, whose ministiration and service God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreede. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shewe himselfe vnto men. And vpon like reason are derived the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a garrd enuiron their Prince, & do adorn and set forth the honorable sheu of his maiestie, and like fouldiers they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their captaine, and are ever so prepared & in readines to do his commandements, that so soone as he doth but becken to them, they prepare themselues to worke, or rather be at their worke alreadie. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other Prophets do describe, but principally Daniel where he faith, that when God sate him down in his throne of judgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them maruellously shewe forth & declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he executeth & vseth his authoritie in the world by them; therefore they are some time called principalities, sometime powres, sometime Dominions. Finally, because in them as it were sitteth the glorie of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the Holy ghost often vseth those other former names to aduance the dignitie of the ministrie of Angels. For it were not reason those instruments should be let passe without honour, by whom God doth specially shewe the presence of his maiestie. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministrie, as in a looking glasse, they partly represent vnto vs the godhead. Although in deed I mislike not this that the old writers do expound, that Chrift was the Angel, where the scripture faith, that the Angel of God appeared vnto Abraham, Iacob, Moses, and other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels in deed, this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no meruaile. For if this honour be giuen to princes & governours, that in their office they stande in the steede of God that is soueraigne king & judge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnes of the glorie of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributars & administratours of Gods bountie toward vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie:
they take upon them the defence of vs, they direct our wayes, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vnierfull; which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath given his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waies. They shall bear thee vp in their handes, leaft thou chance to hit thy feete against a stone. Againe, The Angel of the Lorde standeth rounde about thee, that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Wherby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her maistres. God promiseth to Abraham his servant an Angel to be the guide of his journey. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim & Manasses prayeth, that the Angel of the Lord by whom he himselfe had bin deliuered from all enemie, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defende the tentes of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to rescke Israel out of the handes of their enemies, he raisid vp reveengers by the ministrie of Angels. So finally (to y end I neede not to rehearse many mo) the Angels ministered to Christ and were readie assistent to him in all necessitie. They brought tidings to the women of his resurrection, & to y disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the devill and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vppon them, that are bent against vs. As we reade that the Angell of God to deliuer Hiernafra from the siege, slewe in one night a hundred fower score and sute thousande in the campe of the king of Assyria.

Whether every man haue his particular Angel to attend vpon him, is an idle and needless question.

7 But whether euer of the faithfull be a feueral Angell assigne for their defence, I dare not certainely affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angel of the Persians, and the Angel of the Grecians, hee sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdoms and provinces certaine Angelles appointed as governours. And when Christ saith that the Angels of children do alway beholde the face of the Father, he semeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whom the preservation of them is given in charge. But I can not tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euerie one hath his Angell set over him. But this is to be holden for certaine, that not one Angel only hath care of every one of vs, but that they all by one consent do watch for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more rejoyce of one sinne converted to repentance, than of nintie & nine just that haue stand still in their righteousnes. And it is saide of mo Angels than one, that they conveyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Eliasus shewe to his servaunt so many sierie chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But onelace there is that semeth more plaine than the rest to proue this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doores of the house where the brethren were assembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they saide it was his Angell. It should semee that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to euerie of the faithfull are assigne their Angels for governours. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may well be, notwithstanding standing any thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had giuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people doe imagine that there are appointed to euer one two Angells, as it were diverse gostes, a good Angell and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiously to search for that which doth not much import vs to knowe. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heauen do watch for his safetie, I do not see what he can be the better, if he understand that there is one Angell peculi-arily appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine vs to one Angell the care that God hath to euer one of vs, do great wrong to themselues, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had bin vainely promised vs, wherewith being environed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

8. They that dare take upon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angells, let them looke well what foundation they have. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, & with Iude, the Archangel. And Paul faith, it shall be an Archangel that shal with sound of truere call men to the judgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angells, or discoerne one from another by speciall markes, and appoint every one his place & standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael, & Gabriel: and if you lift to adde the third out of the historie of Tobie, may by their signification seeme to be giuen to the Angells, according to the ca-pacitie of our weakenesse, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christes mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousandes, the seruant of Elizeus saw many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude that it is said, that doe camp round about them that scare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that Spirites haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capaci-tie of our wit, doth not in vaine under Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs our Angells with wings, to the intent we should not doubt that they will be euer with incredible swiftnesse, ready to succour vs, so soone as neede shall require, as if the lightning sent from heauen should flie vnto vs with such swifteness as it is wanted. Whatsoeuer more than this may bee sought of both these points, let vs beleue it to be of that sort of mysteries, whereof the full revelation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiositie in ferching & too much boldnes in speakeing.

9. But this one thing which manie troublesome do call in doubt, is to be holden for certaintie, that Angells are ministering spirits, whose service God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom he both distributeth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other workes in execution. It was in the olde time the opinion of the Saducees, that by Angells is meant nothing els, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this errour erie out so manie testimonies of Scripture, that it is manie that so grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I have before alleaged, where are recited thousandes & Legions of Angells: where joy is giuen vnto them, where

Psa.34.8.

Against the opiion of the Saducees, who denyed that there are any such spirits as we call Angells.
it is said that they vpholde the faithfull with their hands, & carry their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, & such like: there are other places whereby is clearly proued, that they are in deede spirits of a nature that hath substance. For whereas Stephen & Paul do say, that the law was given by the hand of Angels, & Christ faith, that the elect after the resurrection shal be vnto Angels: that the day of judgement is not known to the verie Angels: that he shall then come with his holy Angels: howsoever they be wri-then, yet must they be vnderstanded. Likewise, when Paul charged Timo-thie before Christ & his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, he meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance, but verie spirits.

And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subject vnto them: that Christ tooke vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we mean not the blessed spirites, to whome may these comparisons agree? And the author of that Epistle expoundeth himselfe, where he placeth in the kingdome of heaven the soules of the faithfull & the holy Angels together. Also the same that we have alreadie alleged, that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our thácет, that they marvel at the manifolde grace of God in the Church, that they are subject to Christ, the head. To the same purpose serueth this, that they so oft appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediator, is called an Angel. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnishe the simple with defence against those foolish & reasonles opinions, that many ages agoe raised by Satan do now and then spring vp againe.

Now it resteth, that we seek to meete with that superstition which is commonly wont to crepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministres and deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by and by mans reason faileth to this point, to think that therefore al honour ought to be gien them. So commeth it to passe that those things which belong only to God and Christ, are conveyed away to Angels. By this meanes we see that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many ways obscured, when Angels without warrant of Gods worde were loden with immeasurable tittles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more auncient than this. For it appeareth that Paul himselfe had much to doe with some which so advanced Angels, that they in manner would haue brought Christ vnder subjection. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the authour of all the good things that they have: to the ende wee should not forsake him, and turne vnto them, which can not sufficiently helpe themselves, but are faine to drawe out of the same fountain that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in them a certaine brightnes of the maieftie of God, there is nothing whereunto wee are more easilie enclin'd, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, & to give vnto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing

John in the Revelation confesseth to have chanced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he received this answer. See thou do it not. For I am thy fellow seruant, Worship God.

11 But this danger we shall well beware of, if we do consider why God vteth rather by them that by himselfe without their service to declare his power, to provide for the safetie of the faithful, & to communicate the gifts of his liberalitie among them. Surely he doth not this of necessity, as though he could not be without them; for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his work to passe with an oneely becke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to eafe him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weaknesse, so that wee want nothing that may auail our minde, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth he is our protector. But while we see our selues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kinds of enemies: it may be (such is our weaknesse and frailitie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for dispaire, vnlesse the Lorde after the proportion of our capacitie doe make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meanes he not onely promiseth that he will have care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whom he hath given in charge to travaile for our safetie, & that so long as wee be compassed with the garrisone and support of them, whatsoever danger betideth vs, wee be without all reach of hurt. I grant we do amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, wee still looke about from whence other helpe may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lorde of his infinite clemency and gentleness to helpe this our fault, there is no reaason why wee should neglect his so great benefit. An example thereof we haue in the seruant of Elizeus, which when he sawe the hill besieged with the armie of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was striken downe with feare, as if his maister and hee were then vterly destroyed. Then Elizeus prayed God to open his seruants eyes, and by & by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and serie chariotes, that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his heart againe, & was able with a dreadsleffe mind to looke downe vpon his enemies, with sight of whom he was before in a maner druen out of his witte.

12 Wherefore whatsoever is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that overcomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore provided vs of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be none on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that wee should be led away from God by Angels, which are ordained for this purpose, to testify that his helpe is more present among vs? But they do leade vs away in deede, if they doe not freight lead vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may have eye vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our only helper, if we consider not them to be in his handes

2. Kin.6.17.

That which God doth use to relieve our weaknes, must not cause vs to diminish his glory.
Of the knowledge of that move themselves to no worke but by his direction: if they do not holde vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that wee may hang wholly of him, leane all upon him, be carried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Iacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our minds, howe Angels descend downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe goe vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon stanteth the Lorde of holtes.
Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter ye shall see the heavenes open and the Angels descending to the Sonne of man John 1.51. Therefore the seruant of Abraham being committed to the custodie of the Angel, doeth not therefore call vpon the Angel to helpe him, but holpeth with that commendation, hee prayeth to the Lorde, and beesecheth him to shewe his mercy to Abraham.
For as God doeth not therefore make them minifters of his power & goodnes, to the intent to part his glory with them: so doth he not therefore promise vnto his helpe in their ministration, that we shoulddivide our confidence betweene him and them. Let vs therefore forfake that Platonical philo-ophie, to seeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose, that they may make God more gentle vnto vs: which superflitious and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning duels, they tende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be careful to beware afore hand of their awaites and preparations, & furnish our selves with such weap-onas are strong & sure enough to drive away even the strongest enemies.
For whereas Satan is called the God and prince of the world, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion: thefe descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more ware and watchfull, and reader to enter in battle with him. Which is also sometime set out in express words. For Peter after he had sayde, that the duell goeth about like a roaring Lyon, seeking whom hee may deuour, by and by addeth this exhortation, that we strongly resift him by Faith.
And Paul after he had given warning that we wrestle not with flesh & bloud, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darkness, & spiritual wickednesses, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serve for so great & daunourous a battle. Wherefore let vs also apply all to this ende, that being warned how there doeth continually approch vpon vs an enimie, yea, an enimie that is in courage must hardy, in strength most mighty, in policies most sute, in diligence and celeritie unwearable, with all fortes of engins plenteouly furnished, in skill of warre most ready, wee suffer not our felues by slouthe & cowardice to be surprised, but on the other side with bolde and hardy mindes set our foot to resift him, and ( because this warre is onely ended by Death) encourage our felues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weaknesse and our skilfulnesse, let vs call vpon the helpe of God & enterprise nothing but vpon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to give vs policie, strength, courage and armour.
And that wee should be the more stirr'd vp & enforced to doe, the Scripture warneth vs, that there are not one or two or a fewe enimies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is said, that Mary Magdalene was delivered from seven diuels, wherein she was possessed. And Christ saith, that it is the ordinarie custome, that if after a diueil be once cast out, a man make the place open again, he bringeth seven spirits worse than himselfe, & returneth into his possession, finding it emptie. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that wee must fight with an infinite multitude of enimies, lest despising the fewenesse of them, we should be more slack to enter in battle, or thinking that we have some reprieve in the mean time granted, we should give ourselves to idleness. Wher as many times Satan or the diueil is named in the singular number, hereby is meant that power of wickednesse which standeth against the kingdom of Justice. For as the Church and the fellowship of Saints haue Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, y' hath the chiefes authority amongst them. After which manner this is spoken. Go ye cursed into eternal fire that is prepared for the diueil & his angels.

Here also this ought to stirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diueil, for that he is enemie where called the enemie of God and of vs. For if we have regard of Gods glory, as it is meerely wee shoulde, then ought wee with all our force to bende our felues against him, that goeth about to extinguishe it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdom of Christ as we ought, then must we needs take an unappeasable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Againke, if any care of our owne safeties doe touch vs, then ought we to have neither peace nor truce with him that continually lyeth in waites for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the third Chapter of Genesis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honour, & throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Evangelistes, where he is called an enemie, and is said to scatter tares, to corrupt the seed of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ teesifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherrer, and a lyer, wee finde by experience in all his doings. For he assaileth the truth of God with lyes, obscureth the light with darknesse, entangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiseth vp hatreds, kindleth contentions and strifes, doeth all things to this end to ouerthrow the kingdom of God, and drown men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature froward, spiteful and malicious. For needes must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to assaile the glorye of God & salvation of men. And that doth John speak of in his Epistle, when he writeth, that he finneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine & principal workman of all malice and wickednesse.

But forasmuch as the diueil was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which wee affigne in his nature, is not by creation, but by depravation. For whatsoever damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne revolted and fall. Which the scripture therefore giuenth vs

The reason why sometime many diuels, and sometimes only one is mentioned.
Mat.12.42.

Satan being as the first created good, hath forsaken out of his kind by falling vno humbly from God.
17 As for the discord & strife that we say is betwene God & Satan, we must so take it that still we holde this for certayne, that he can doe nothing but by the wil & suffrance of God. For we read in the historic of Job, that he presented himselfe before God to receive his commandements, & durst not go forward to doe any enterprise till he had obtained licence. So when Ahab to be deceived he tooke vpon him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, & so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the euill spirit of the Lord, y tormenting Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sins of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, y the plagues were laid vpon y Egyptians by y euill angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally restifie, y the blinding of y wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is evidente therefore y Satan is under the power of God, & so governed by his authorize y he is compelled to doe him service. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, y the works of Satan dis agree with the works of God, we doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the suffrance of God. I speake not nowe of his will, nor of his endeavor, but of the effect onely. For with the devill is wicked of nature, he is not enclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly caried to stubbornesse.
stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickednesse he is stirred vp to the enterprising of those things that he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tyed & restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth only those things that are granted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to apply his service whithersoever God compelleth him.

18 Nowe because God boweth the unclean spiritus hither and thither as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this gouernement, that they exercitethe faithfull with battell, they set upon them out of ambushes, they assaile them with invasions, they press them with fighting, and oftentimes weary them, trouble them, make them affraide, and sometime wound them, but never overcome nor oppresse them. But the wicked they subdue and draw away, they raigne upon their soules & bodies, & abuse them as bondslaves to all mischeuous doings. As for the faithfull, because they are vnsqueted of such enemies, therefore they heare these exhortations. Do not give place to the diuell. The diuell your enemie goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom he may deuoure, whom refist ye being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kinde of strife, when he faith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promis of the breaking of Satan's head, pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore I say, that the faithfull can never be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times striken downe, but they are never so astonnied with all, but that they recover themselves. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised vp again; they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they do labour in all the course of their life that in y end they obteine the victorie; but I speake not this of euery doing of theirs. For we know that by the just vengeance of God David was for a time giuen over to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause Paul faith there is hope of pardon, although any haue beene entangled with the snares of the diuell. Therefore in another place the same Paul faith, that the promise aboue alledged is begun in this life, wherein we must wrastle, and is performed after our wrestling ended; when he faith, the God of peace shall shortly beare downe Satan vnder your feete. This victorie hath alwaye fully beene in our head Christ, because the Prince of the worlde had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doeth now partly appeare, and shall be perfited, when being vnclad of our flesh by which wee are yet subject to weakeenesse, wee shall be full of the power of the Holy ghost. In this maner when the kingdome of Christ is raised vp and aduanced, Satan with his power falleth downe, as the Lord himselfe faith. I saue Satan fall as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this aunswere hee confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Again, when the Prince poffefseth his owne pallace, all things that hee poffefseth Luke. 11, 21.

H. are are in peace, but when there cometh a stronger, he is thrown out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying overcame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed upon all his armies, that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would every moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakenesse, and what is his furious strength) how could we stand, yea, even so little time against his manifold & continual assaults, but being supported by the victorie of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuell to raigne over the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked & vnbelieving to gouerne, whom God doth not vouchsafe to have reckened in his flock. For it is said, that he posseseth this world without controversie til he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that he doth blinde all them that beleue not the Gospel. Againe, that he perforceth his worke in the stubborne children, and worthlie, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrath. Therefore, to whom should they be rather subject than to the minister of God's vengeance? Finally, they are said to be of their Father the Diuell, because as the faithfull are hereby known to be the children of God, because they beare his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children.

19. As wee haue before confuted that trifling Philosophie concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth vp in the minde of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly fayne, that Diuels are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may wee shortly do, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vppon this point. First, where the vinecleane Spirites are called, Angels, Apostataes, which have swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the vrie names doe sufficiently expresse,that they are not motions or affections of minde, but rather in deede as they be called minde or Spirites endued with sense and understanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Diuell: were it not an inuic comparison, if the name of the Diuell signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plainly, that the diuell sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Inde bringeth in Michael the Anchangele fighting with the diuell, doules he setteth against the good Angel an euil and rebellious Angel. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Iob, that Satan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to seele by the judgement of God, and specially shall seele at the resurrection. Sonne of David, why arst thou come before the time to torment vs? Againe, Goe ye curfed into eternall fire that is prepared for the Diuell and his Angels. Againe, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into chains of darkenesse to be kept vnto damnation, &c. Howe fonde should these speeches be, that the Diuels are ordainned to eternall judgement, that fire is prepared for them, that they they are now alreadie tormented and vexed by the glory of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleue the worde of the Lord, & little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is newe: I suppose I have performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly mindes should be furnished against such fond errors, wherewith vnquiet men do trouble both themselues and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, leаft any entangled with that error, while they thinke they have none to stande against them, should waxe more slowe & vnprofitable to refift.

20. In the meane time let it not be wearisome vs, in this so beautiful a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinarie workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere alreadie faide, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way soever we turne our eyes, all that we see are the workes of God, & with godly consideration to wery for what ende God did make them. Therefore, that wee may conceiue by Faith so much as behoueth vs to know of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the world, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterwarde more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basil and Ambrose. Out of it wee shallearne that God by the power of his worde and Spirit created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all liuing creatures and things without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of things, to euerie thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abodings, and where all things are subject to corruption, yet hath he so provid'd, that of all sortes some shalbe preferued to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secret means, and powr eth nowe and then, as it were a newe livelineffe into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to encrease by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not dye together. So hath he maruellous garnished the heauen & the earth, with so absolutely perfect plentiful, varietie and beautie of all things as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chozen stuffe, last of all howe in framing man and adorning him with so goodly beautie, & with so many and so great gifts, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the world, lett it suffice to haue once againe touched these fewe things by the way. For it is better, as I haue alreadie warned the readers, to fetch a fuller understanding of this matter out of Moses and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conveyed the historie of the worlde by writing to perpetuall memorie.

21. It is to no purpose, to make much a doe in disputing, to what end the consideration of the workes of God ought to tende, or to what matter it ought to be applied: forasmuch as in other places alreadie a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe worde be ended. Truely, if we were minded to sett out as it is worthic,
Cap. 14. Of the knowledge of

worthie, how unestimateable wisedome, power, justice, and goodness of God appeareth in the framing of the world, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largenesse of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glassses the infinite riches of his wisedome, justice, bountie and power, we should not runne over them, as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandering looke, as I may so call it, but that wee should with consideration rest long vp upon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeat them with remembrance. But because we are nowe busied in that kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is meete that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short, let the readers know that then they have conceived by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniversal rule, that they passe not over with not considering or forgetfulness of those vertues, that God presented to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselves, that they may therwith be throughly moved in their harts. The first of those we do when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was to place & aptly set in so wel disposed order the multitude of his starrs that is in heauen, that nothing can be devised more beautiful to behold, to set & fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot move, and to other some, to graunt a freecourse, but so that in moving they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may deuide in measure the dayes and nightes, monethes, yeares, and seasones of the yeare, and to bring this inequality of dayes which we daily fee to such a tempered order, that it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we mark his power in susteyning so great a body, in gouerning the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, & such like. For these fewe examples doe sufficiently declare, what it is to recorde the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should truell as I saide, to express it all in words, I should never make an end, forasmuch as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodness, so many examples of his wisedome, as there be forms of things in the world, yea, as there be things either great or small.

The fruit of our considering the creatures of God must be the feeling of his goodness toward our selves, and our growing thereby in faith, hope, & godnesse.

22. Now remaineth the other part which commeth neerer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard & safetie, & therewith do feele his power & grace in our selves, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed upon vs: we may thereby stirre vp our selves to the trust, invocation, praise and loue of him. Nowe, as I haue before saide, God himselfe hath shewed in the verie order of creation, that for mans sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he deuided the making of the world into fixe dayes, whereas it had ben as easie for him in one moment to haue in all pointes accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peace to peace to come to y end of it. But then it pleased him to shew his prouidence & fatherly carefullnes toward vs, that before he made man he prepared all that he foresaw should be profitable for him
The xv. Chapter.

What a one man was created: where is there so treated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of free will, & of the first integrity of nature.

Now we must speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the worke of God the most noble & most excellent example of his justice, wisdom & goodness: but also because we have saide in the beginning, we cannot plainly & perfectly know God, vnlesse we have withall a mutuall knowledge of our selues. Although the same knowledge be of two sorts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profit for us to know our creation, vnlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption & deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time wee will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heede that in precisely declaring only the natural euils of man, we feeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh her selue to have sufficient defence in this colour, if it may lay for her selfe that whatsoever fault she hath, the same did after a certaine maner proceede from God, & ticketh not if she be accused, to quarle with God, & to lay the fault vpon him whereof she is worthily accused. And they that would feeme to speake somewhat more reuencently of the majesty of God, yet do willingly seeke to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein though not openly they blame God also, to whose reproch it should fall if it were proued if there is any fault in nature.
Cap. 15. Of the knowledge of Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the ways to escape, whereby the thinketh the blame of her own evils may any way be put off from her, we must diligently endeavour to meete with this mischief. Therefore we must so handle the calamity of mankind that we cut off all excuse, & deliver the justice of God from all accusation. Afterward in place convenient we shall see how far men be now from that pureness that was given to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth & claye, a bridle was put upon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, than for them to glory in their excellencie, that doe not oneley dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselves in part but earth & ashes. But forasmuch as God did not oneley vouchsafe to give life unto an earthen vessel, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortal Spirit, Adam might restfully glory in so great liberality of his maker.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule & body, & by the name of soule I meane an immortal essence, and yet created, which is the nobler parte of him. Sometime it is called the Spiritie. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirite are joyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirite is set by it self for, it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, saith that then the spirite returneth to him that gave it. And Christ commending his Spirite to his Father, and Stephen his Spirite to Christ doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is delivered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit, because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essence: both the thing it selfe, and all the Scripture sheweth, that they doe too grossly erre.
True it is, that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to bee, they waxe dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darkenesse, so that they doe not thinke upon this, that they shall remaine alue after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkenesse, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortalitie. Surely the conscience which discerning betweene good and euill, answereth the judgement of God, is an undoubted signe of an im-mortall Spirite. For how could a motion without essence attaine to come to the judgement feare of God, and throwe it selfe into feare by finding her owne guiltiness? For the bodie is not moued with feare of a Spiritual paine, but that solely oneley vppon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the soule hath an essence. Moreover the seriue knowledge of God doeth proue that the soules which ascend vp aboue the world are immor-tall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attaine to the fountain of life. Finally, forasmuch as so many excellent gifts were with mens mind is endued, doe criue out that there is some divine thing engraven in it, there are euie so many testimonies of an immortal essence. For that sense which is in brute beastes, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenesse of the mind of man which veweth the heauen and earth and secretes of nature, & com-preprehending all ages in understanding & memorie, digesteth every thing in order, & gathereth things to come by things past, doeth plainly shew that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing feuerall from the body. We concieve by understanding the invisible God and Angels, which the body can-do not. We knowe things that be right, just, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the spirit is the sea-of this understanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witness of immortality, from such as it doth not onely minister unto vs, thoughts of those things that never were done, but also foreknowings of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers do excellently set out with more gorgeous garnishment of words: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe feuerall from the bodie, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remove out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put of that which is corruptible, that finally at the last day we may receive reward every man as he hath behaned himself in his body. For these places and other that we doe both where commonly light upon, doe not onely manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giving to the soule the name of man do shewe that it is the principal part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithful to cleanse themselves from all defiling of the flesh & the spirit, he maketh two partes of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sin. And Peter where he calleth Christ the shepherd & bishop of soules, should have spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conveniently stand together which he faith of the eternal salvation of soules, where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he faith that euill desires do fight against the soule, & where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues sayth, that the Pastors do watch that they may yeld account for our soules, vnde it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same pur-pocse ferueth it that Paul calleth God for witness to his owne soule, because it could not be called in judgement before God vnde it were subject to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to fear him which after that he hath killed the bodie, can throwe the soule into hell fier. Nowe where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth distinguish the Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the only Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirm the essence of soules. Moreover, if the soules remained not alue being deli-uered from prisons of their bodies, Christ should verie fondly have brought in the soule of Lazarus joyful in the bosome of Abraham, & againe the soule of the rich man subject to horrible torments. The same thing doeth Paul notifie when he teacheth that wee wander abroade from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that wee enjoy his presence being out of the flesh.
But, because I wil nor be long in a matter that is not obscure, I wil adde only this out of Luke, that it is reckoned among the errors of the Sadduces, that they did not beleue that there were any Spirites and Angels.
Man was created like to God, not in the fashion of his body, nor because he was framed at the first according to the shape which the soune of God should afterwards take upon him: nor because he was like unto Christ, who is properly God's image; but for that in his first integrity he resembled the excellency of his Creator.

Gen. 1:27.

Also a strong proofe hereof may be gathered of this, where it is sayde, that man is create like to the image of God. For although the glorie of God do appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no doubt that the proper seate of the image of God is in the soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape, inasmuch as the same doth distinguish & feuer vs from brute beastes, we do also therein more neerely approch to God than they: neither will I much stande against them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the image of God, that where all other living creatures do grovelingwife behold the ground, to man is given an upright face; & he is commanded to looke upon the heauen, & to aduance his countenance toward the starres; so that this remaineth certaine, that the image of God which appeareth or shineth in these outward signes, is spiritual. For Osander (whome his writings declare to have beene in fickle imaginations fondly wittie) referring the image of God without difference, as well to the body as to the soule, mingleth heauen & earth together. For he faith, that the Father, the Sonne, & the holy ghost did settle their image in man; because although Adam had stand without falling, yet should Christ have become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But when shall he find that Christ is the image of the Spirit? I grant in deed that in the person of the Mediator shineth the glorie of the whole godhead. But how shall the external word be called the image of the Spirit whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it overthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne & the holy Ghost, if he do here call him his image. Moreover I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the holy ghost in the flesh that he tooke upon him, & by what marke & features he doth express the likenes of him. And wheras this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe, which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osander's inuention be beleued, man was fashioned only after the figure & paterne of Christ in that he was man, & so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, whereas the scripture in a farre other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their subtle inuention is more colourable which do thus expound it, y Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the only image of God. But that exposition also is not found. Also some interpreters make a great disputacion about Image & Likenes, while they seek a difference between those two words, where is no difference at all, saying, that this word Likenes is added to expound the other. First we knowe that among the Hebrewes such repetitions are common, wherin they expresse one thing twice; and in the thing it self there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Wherby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which do so suttely argue about the wordes, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of soule, as Deuoth, that is to say, Likenes in the qualities, or what other thing soever it be that they teach. For whereas God determineth to creat man after his.
his own image, this being somewhat darkly spoken, he doth as by way of explanation repeat it in this saying, After his likeness: as if he would have said, that he would make man, in whom he would represent himself as in an image, because of the markes of likeness graven in him. And therefore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doth repeat the image of God twise, leaving out the name of Likeness. And it is a triving objection that Osiannder makest, that not a part of man, or the soule onely with the giftes thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giue him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Triving, I say, will all readers that have there found wit judge this objection. For where whole man is called mortal, yet is not the soule thereby made subject to mortalitie. Again,where he is called a living creature endued with reason, it is not thereby ment, that the body hath reason & understanding. Although therefore the soule is not the whole man, yet it is not inconuenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I holde still that principle which I have before established, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellency, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kind of living creatures. Therefore in that wordes is noted the integritie that man had when he was endued with right understanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, & all his senses governed in right order, & when in excellent gifts he did truly resembe the excellency of his Creator. And though the principall seate of the image of God were in the mind & heart, or in the soule & the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not so much as the body, wherein did not some sparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is that also in all the partes of the world, there doe shine some resemb lance of the glory of God: whereby wee may gather that where it is faide, that his Image is in man, there is in folaying a certaine secret comparison, that aduaunceth man aboue all other creatures, & doth as it were feuer him from the common sort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the likeness of God, (as Christ himself testifieth) our chief perfection shal be to become like vnto them. But not without cause doeth Moses by that peculiar title set forth the grace of God toward vs, specially, where he compareth onely visible creatures with man.

4. But yet it seemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, ruleffe it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: & whereas he ought to be counted a glasse, ressembling the glory of God. But ye can be by no other thing better knowne, than by the repairing of mans corrupted nature. First it is doubtlesse, that when Adam fel from his estate, he was by that departure estranged from God. Wherefore although we grant that the Image of God was not altogether defaced & blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that all that remaineth, is but vgly deformitie. Therefore the beginning of recoverie of faffetie for vs, is in that restoring which we obtain by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored vs vnto true and perfect integretie. For although where Paul doth in comparison set the quickening Spirit that Christ giuest to the faithful, against the living soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principal point, that this is the end of our regeneration, that Christ should newe fashioned vs to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renewed according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeeth this saying: put on the newe man which is created according to God. Nowe it is to be seen what Paul doith principally comprehend under this renewing. First he speaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteousness and holiness. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seen in the light of the mind, in the righteousness of heart, and soundness of all the partes. For although I grant that this is a figurative phrase of speech to set the part for the whole:
yet cannot this principle be overthrown, that that thing which is y chief, in the renewing of the image of God, was also the principal in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in an other place he teacheth, that we beholding the glory of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Now do we see how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to which we being fashioned are restored, that in true godlineesse, righteousness, pureneffe, and understanding, we are the image of God. Which principle being established, Of Sanders imagination of the shape of our body doeth easily vanish away of itself. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the image and glory of God, and the woman is excluded from that degree of honour, it appeareth by the rest of the text, that the same is to be applied only to civil order of policy. But that under the name of image, whereof we speak, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spiritual & eternal life, I think it be already sufficiently proved. And the same thing doth John confirme in other words: saying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall worde of God was the light of men.
For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, whereby man excell eth all living creatures, to soever him from the common sort, because he hath attained no common life, but joyned with the light of understanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the image of God.
Therefore is the image of God the uncorrupted excellencie of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted & almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but dis-ordered, mangled, & filthily spotted: yet the same doth in some part appear in the elect, in so much as they are regenerate, & shall obtain her full bright-nes in heauen. But that we may know on what parts it consisteth, it shall be good to entreate of the powers of the soule. For that speculativue deuise of Augustine is not found, where he faith, that the soule is a glasse of the Trini-tie, because that there are in it understanding, will, and memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approved, which set the image of God in the power of dominion given vs to him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed lord and possessor of all things, whereas in deed the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, & is an inward good gift of the soule.

5 But before I go any further, it is needfull that I meete with the doting error error of the Manichees, which Sermess hath attempted to bring in age, Where it is faid, that God breath'd the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is ease even shortly to shew how many groffe and soule absurdities this duellish error draweth with it. For if the soule be by derivation part of the essence of God, it shall followe that the nature of God is subject, not only to change and passions, but also to ignorance, envy lustes, weakenesse, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do issue and diversely drowe his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yieldeth as vanquished even to small tentations, & wee knowe that the soule it selfe is the sink & receiver of all filthinesse, all which things we must acribe to the nature of God, if wee graunt that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret inflowing of godhead. Who would not abhorre this monstrous devise? Truly in deed doth Paul allledge out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God, but in quality & not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly gifts. But in the meantime, to teare in funder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that every man doth possess a part of it, is too much madnesse. Therefore wee must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be graven in them, were no lesse created than the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing._

And although the spirit of man came from God, & in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be saide, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also of Man, while he glorifieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly error, not acknowledging the image of God to be in man without his essential justice, as though God by the inftintible power of his holy spirit could not make vs like unto himselfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially poure himselfe into vs. With whatsoever colour many do go about to disguise these deceit, yet shall they never so beguilie the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wittes, but that they will easily see that these things favour of the Manichee error. And where saith Paul entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be redly gathered out of his words, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glory of Christ, we are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spirit of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs not of one substance with God.

6 It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortal substance. In deed some other also, that is Socrates, doe touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach it to other, which himselfe was not persuaded. But therefore is Plato of a better judgement, because he doth in his soul consider the image of God. Some other do so bind the powers & vertues of the soule to this present life, that being ou of the body they leave to it nothing. Now we have alreadie taught by the scripture, that it is a bodiles substance:

The doctrine of Philosophers concerning the nature & powers of the Soul.
Of the knowledge of

now must we adde that although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, & doth there dwell as in a house, not only to minister life to all the parts of the body, & to make the instruments thereof meete & fitly serving for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to bear the chief office in governing the life of man, & that not onely about the dutie in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the service of God. Although this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceived, yet even in the vices themselves there remaine emprinted some leaunings thereof. For whence commeth it but of shame, that men have so great care what be reported of them? And whence commeth shame, but of regard of honestie? Whereof the beginning & cause is, that they understand that they are naturally born to obscure Justice, in which perfuasion is enclosed the seede of religion. For as without all controvercie man was made to meditation of the heauenly life; so is it certaine, that the knowledge thereof was engraven in his soule.
And surely man should want the principall vs of his understanding, if hee should be ignorant of his own felicite, whereof the perfection is, that he be joyned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire thereunto. And so the more that every man studie to approch vnto God, the more he thereby prowe thime to be endued with reason. As for them that would haue divers soules in man, that is, a several soule, & a reasonable soule, although they seemed to say somwhat by reason proovable, yet because there is no stedfaft certaintie in their reasons, wee must reject the, unless we lifted to accombe our soules in things trifling & vnprofitable.
A great disagreement they, there is betwene the instrumental motions & the part of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it self did not also distingue from it selfe, and some others of it doe strive with other some, as they were armie of enemies. But as so much as that troublesome proceed-deth of the corruption of nature, it were amiss to gather therby, that there are two soules, because the powers of one soule do not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtle disputation of the powers themselves, I leaue that to the Philosophers. A simple deffinition shall suffise vs for edification of godlines. I grant that the things they teach are ture, & not only pleasant but also profitable to be known, & wel gathered of them, & I forbide not such as are deireous to learn to studie them. First therfore I admit that there are five fenes, which Plato better liked to call instruments, whereby all objectes are powred into Common sense, as into a place of receit: then followeth Phantasie, which judgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belong-the vnuerse judgement of things; last, is the Understanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that reason is wont to discourse vpon, and consider. And to the Understanding mind, Reason & Phantast, which are the three powers of the soule, that rest in knowledge, there do answer three other that doe rest in Ap-etire, that is to say, Will, the partes whereof are to couer those things that the Understanding mind and Reason do lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Phantast do minister vnto it.

The
The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of these things that phante and sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I fear they shall more entangle vs with obscurities, than further vs, I think it best to overpass them. If any man lift otherwife to divide the powers of the soule, & to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason in itself, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meane directed, & to call the other the power of understanding, which is by it selfe partaker of reason. I am not much against it, neither will I confute this opinion, y there are three beginnings of doing that is to say, Sense, Understanding, & Appetite. But let vs rather choose a division, that is within the capacity of al men, which cannot be had of the Philosophers. For they whè they mean to speak most plainly, do divide the soule into Appetite & Understanding, but either of these they make of two forts. Understanding, they say, is somtime contemplative, which being contented with only knowledge, hath no moving of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Somtime they say it is practical, which by conceiving of good or evil doth diversely move the Will. And appetite do divide into Will & Lust. Will they call that, when Appetite which they call homoe obeyeth to reason, & Lust they call that, when the appetite shaking off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, wherby man may rightly governe himselfe.

But we are constrained in what to swarve from this maner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, do wrongfully confound the two very diverse states of man. Let vs therfore thus think of it, y there are in the soule of man two parts, which shall seue at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Understanding & Will. And let it be the office of understanding, to discern between objects, or things set before it, as each of them shall seeme worthie to be liked or misliked: and the office of Will, to choose & followe that which understanding saith to be good, & to refuse & flie that which understanding saith daisy. Let vs not here be staid at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotle, that y mind hath of it self no moving, but that it is choice which moueth it, which choice he calleth the desiring understanding. But to the end we be not entangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice vs, y the Understanding is as it were the guide & governour of the soule, & that Will hath alwaies regard to the appointment of Understanding, & abideth the judgement thereof in her desires. According whereunto Aristotle himself hath truly said, y fleeting or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the understanding mind is affirming & denying. Now how certeine the government of Understanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here we meane only to shewe that there can be found no power in the soule but that may well be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this fort under Understanding wee comprehend Sense, which other do so distinguish, that they say Sense is enclined to pleasure, for which Understanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the appetite of sense is Concupiscence & Lust, the affection of vnderstanding is Will. Againe, in stead of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly vned.

8. God therefore hath furnished the soule of man with an vnderstanding mind, whereby he might discrete good from euil, & right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers have called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adiyoned Will, to which belonged choice. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not only had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisedome, & judgement, for the governement of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euin to God & eternal felicitie. Then to have choice added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, & order all the instrumentall motions, and that the Will might be altogether agreable to the governement of reason. In this Integrity, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might have attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to mowe question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to dicuss what might have chance or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might have stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, & there was not given him constanctie to continue, therefore he so easilie fell. Yet his choice of good & euil was free. And not that only, but also in his vnderstanding mind, & in his will was most great vprightnesse, & all his instrumentall partes orderly framed to obedience, vis-til by destroying himself he corrupted the good things that were in him.

From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, & for strong joynts in an vnjoynted overthrow. This principle they helde, that man could not be a living creature, endowed with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choice of good & euil: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betweene vertues & vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his own advice. Thus farre had they faide well if there had beene no change in man, which change because they knewe not of, it is no maruaile though they confound heaven and earth together. But as for them which professing themselves to be the disciples of Christ, do yet seeke for freewill in man, that hath bin loft & drowned in spiritual destruction, they in going meane between the Philosophers opinions & heavenly doctrine are plainly deceived, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we haue to hold in mind, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posteritie euer since, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath frō him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritance. For then al the partes of his soule were framed to right order, then stooed safe the soundnesse of his vnderstanding mind, & his will free to choose what good. If any do object that it stood but in slippery state, because his power was but weake, I answer that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him al excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraine God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I grant such a nature had bin better, but therefore precisely to quarrel with God, as though it had bin his dutie to haue giuen that vnto man, is too much vnjustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choise to giue how much pleased him. But why he did not vpholde him with the strenght of steadfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secret counsell: it is our part only to be so farre wife as with sobriety we may. Man receiued in deed to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. For of this wil should have followed steadfast continuance. Yet is he not excusable, which receiued so much that of his owne wil he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compel God to giue him any other than a meane wil & a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glorie.

That God by his power doth nourish & maintain the world, which himself hath created, & by his prouidence doth governe all the partes thereof.

But it were verie fond e and bare to make God a creator for a moment, which doth nothing since he hath once made an ende of his worke. And in this point principally ought wee to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the worlde, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the verie wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth, are compelled to rife vp vnto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar manner by it selfe, whereby it giueth to God the whole praife of creation. And therefore ferteeth that laying of the Apostle, which we before alleged, that wee doe not understand but by faith, that the worlde was made by the worde of God. For vnde the wee passe forwarde euen vnto his prouidence, wee doe not yet rightly conceiue what this meane th, that God is the creator, howe soeuer wee do seme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the verie creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doeth nothing but wey and consider the wisedome, power, & goodnesse of the workeman in making such a pece of worke (which things doe of themselves offer and thrust themselves in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine generall doing in presuring and governning the same, vpon which dependeth the power of moveing. Finally it thinketh that the lucy force at the beginning put into all things by God, doeth suflince to susteine them. But faith ought to perce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall governor and preserver of them: and that, not by stirring with an vniversal motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the partes thereof, but by sufteyning, cherishing and curing for, with singular prouidence every one of those things that hee hath created euen to the leaft sparowe. So Davi'd after he had first saide that the worlde was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the worde of the Lorde (faith he) the heavens were stablifled, and all the power thereof by the spirite of his mouth. By and by he addeth, The

Lord looked downe upon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that hee sayeth farther to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleueth, that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse he were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earnestly beleueth that God made the world, vnlesse he be persuaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause David doeth by good order conuey vs from the one to the other. Generally in deed both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens mindes doe conceive that all partes of the world are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they atttein not so farre as David both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying all things waiete vpone thee, that thou maist giue them food in due season. Thou giuest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hande and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face, they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou send foorth thy Spirit eu, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our beeing and are moued, and doe liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is known.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be known, that the prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by adventuere. Nowe forasmuch as it hath bee commonly beleueth in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in al men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue bene beleueth concerning Prudence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beastes, if by winde sodenly rising hee suffer shipwracke on the see, if hee be killed with the fall of a houe or of a tree, if an other wandring in desert places finde remedie for his pouertie, if hauing beeene tossed with the waues, he attaine to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduerstitie the reason of the flesh doth ascrib to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Chrift, that all the haires of his head are numbred, will seeke for a cause further of, & wil firmly beleueth that all chaunces are governed by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them haue his owne propertie naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so far, as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instrumentes, whereby God continually pouereth in so much effect as pleaseth him, & at his wilboweth & turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more maruellous or more glorious than of the Sunne. For besides the light to the whole world with his brightenes, howe great a thing is this that he cherisheth & quickeneth all living creatures with his heat, that he breatheth fruitfulness into the earth with his beames? that out of seedes
For heauen, fruitcining till to gethimselfe? Heft all but neceffary he that his down that more plainly eucryere, moneth and day, is governed by ter neire, noci but becaufe readie maund is faid in the PfaImc, that he doth what fowhe will, things caufe rather vnderhishandc.

And truly God doth claime & wil haue vs giue vnto him an almightie, neffe, nor such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, & as it were fleping, but waking, effectual, working & busied in continual doing.

3 And truely God doth claime & wil haue vs giue vnto him an almightinesse, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vain, idle, & as it were sleeping, but waking, effectual, working & busied in continual doing. Nor such a one as is only a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if hee woulde command a riuier to flowe by his appointed chanes, but such a one as is bent & ready at all his particular mouings. For he is therefor called almightie, not because he can do & yet stretch stil & doth nothing, or by generall instinct only continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but because he governing both heaven & earth, by his prouidence do ordereth all things that nothing chaunceth but by his advised purpose. Whereas it is said in the Pfalme, that he doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine & determined wil. For it were verie fond to expound the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning & caufe of all mouing: whereas thy faithfull ought rather in aduersitie to case themselves with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance & commandement of God, because they are vnder his hande. If then the government of God doe so extende to all his works, it is a verie childish caution to enclofe it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraud God of his glorie than the selues of a most profitable doctrine, whoseouer doe restraine the prouidence of God within so narrow bounds, as if he suffered all things to be caried with an ungouerned course, according to a perpetual law of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if he should be left subject to every motion of the I. heauen,

heaven, the air, the earth, & the waters. Beside that by that meaneth the singular goodness of God towards every man is too much unhonorable diminished. David crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers breasts are eloquent enough to manifest the glory of God, because even so soon as they be come out of the wombe, they finde food prepared for them by his heavenly care. This is in deede generally true, so that yet our eyes & senses overpass not that unmarked which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers haue full & plentiful breasts, some other almost drie, as it pleaseth God to feede one more liberally, & another more scarcely. But they which give the due praise to the almightynes of God, doe receive double profit thereby, the one that he hath sufficiently large abilitie to do them good, in whose possession are both heaven & earth, & to whose beck all creatures do attend vpon, to yield themselves to his obedience: the other that they may safely rest in his protection, to whose will are subject all these hurtfull things that may any way be feared, by whose authority he with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his furies & all his preparation, vpon whose back doth hang all that ever is against our safetie. And no other way but this can the imeasurable & superstitious feares be corrected or appeased, which we oftentimes conceiue by dangers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearfull I say we be, if where creatures doe threaten vs or give vs any cause of feare, we be so afraid thereof, as if they had of themselves any force or power to do vs harme, or did vnto us & by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against us hurtes that they doe, there were not sufficient help in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeeth the children of God that they shoulde not feare the sterres & signes of heaven, as the vnbelieuers are wont to do. He censur eth not every kind of feare. But when the vnbelieuers to giue away the government of the world from God vnto Planets, doe faine that their felicitie or miferie doth hang on the decrees & foreshowings of the sterres, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe, that their feare is withdrawed away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the sterres & comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulness, let him keepe alwayes in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are governed by the secrete counsel of God, so that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both writing & willing it to be.

4. First therefore let the readers learne, that providence is called that, not wherewith God idlyly beholdeth from heaven what is done in his world, but wherewith as guiding the sterne he setteth and ordreth all things that come to passe. So doeth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his eyes. For when Abraham saide vnto his sonne, God shall provide, he meant not onely, that God did foreknowe the successfull them to come, but that he did cast the care of a thing to him vnownen vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certeine ende. Whereby followeth, that providence consisteth in doing: for too much fondly doe many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether so grosse which giue vnto God a government but disordered, and without aduised advised choyse,(as I haue before saide,)that is to say, such as whirleth and driueth about with a general motion the fame thew of the world with all parts thereof, but doeth not peculiarily direct the doing of euerie creature. Yet is this error not tollerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithstanding this Providence which they call vniversall) that all creatures may be mo-ued by chance, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choyse of his will. And so doe they parte the government betwene God & man, that God by his power inspires into man a motion whereby he may wotke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his own doings by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefly they meane that the world, mens matters, and men themselves are governed by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicurians (which pestilence the world hath alwayes beene filled with) which dreame of an idle and flou-thfull God, and other as mad as they, which in old time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the ayre, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For against so euident madness the dumme creatures themselves doe sufficiently criue out. For, nowe my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleuued, which gowing to God a cern-taine blind, and I wot not what vnscerteine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is, by his incomprehensible wisedome to direct and dispose all things to their ende: and so in name onely and not in deede it maketh God a ruler of the worlde, because it taketh from him the government of it. For what[(I beseech you)] is it else to governe, but so to be ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maieft rule them by appointed order? Yet do I not altogether refiect that which is spoken of the vniuersall prouidence: so that they will againe graunt me this, that the worlde is ruled by God, not onely because he maintaine both the order of nature which himselfe hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of euyry one of his works. True it is, that all sorte of things are mov'd by a secreat instinct of na-ture, as if they did obey the eternall commandement of God, and that that which God hath once determined doeth of itself proceede forwarde. And hereunto may that be applyed which Chrift saith, that hee and his Father were euen from the beginning alwayes working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him we lye, are mov'd and haue our being, and that which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, meaning to proue the Godhead of Chrift, faith, that by his mightie commandement all things are sustayned. But they doe wrong which by this colour doe hide and dark the spesiall prouidence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is meruaille that any man could doubt of it. And surely they themselves that drawe the same veile which I speake of to hide it, are compell'd by waye of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they doe wrongfully re-straine the same onely to peculiar doings. Wherefore we must proue that God doeth so giue heede to the government of the successesse of all things, and that they all doe so procede from his determinate counsell, that no thing happeneth by chaunce.
5 If we grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselves or by chance carried whither the inclination of nature driveth them, the mutual succeeding by turnes of dayes & nights, of Winter & Summer, shall be the worke of God, in so much as he appointing to every one their duties, hath set them a certaine law, y is if they should always kepe one measure in equal proportion, as well the dayes that come after the nights, the moneths after moneths, & yeres after yeres. But when sometimes immoderate heates with drines do burne up all the grain, sometime unreasonable raines do marre the corne, when sodaine harms doth by haile & tempests: that shall not be the work of God, vnlesse perhaps it be because the clouds or faire wether, or cold or heate have their beginning of the meeting of the planets or other naturall causes. But by this meanes is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly favour, nor for the judgements of God. If they say that God is beneficial enough to mankinde because he poureth into the heauen & earth an ordinarie power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine & prophane an invention, as though the fruitfulness of one yere were not the singular blessing of God, & death & famine were not his curse & vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritie of God himselfe suffice vs. In the law & in the Prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watreth the earth with dew & raine, he declareth his favour, & that when by his commandement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blastings & other harmes, when the fields are striken with haile & tempests, it is a token of his certaine & special vengeance. If we grant these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commandement of God. David praiseth the generall providence of God, that he giveth meate to the Rauens birds that cal vppon him: but when God himself threatened famine to living creatures, doeth he not sufficiency declare that he feedeth all living things sometyme with scarceness & sometyme with more plentiful portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparowe of yeuer doth small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpose of God, then must wee needs confess with the Prophers, that he so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke upon all things that chance in heauen and earth.

6 But because we knowe that the world was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therefore consider this end in the governance of man. The Prophet Hieremie cryeth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steppes. And Salomon faith, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lorde, and howe shall a man dispose his owne way? Nowe let them say that man is moved by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that moving whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truely faide, then should man haue the free choice of his owne wayes. Peraduenture they will denie deny that, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certain that the Prophet & Salomon do give unto God, not onely power but also choice & appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Salon in another place doth finely rebuke this rashnes of men, that appoint unto themselves another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparations (faith he) of the heart are in man, but the answere of the tongue is of the Lord. It is a fond madness that men will take vpon them to do things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what he will. And the scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at is don in the world but by his appointment, he saith thus, those things which seeme most happening by chance are subject to him. For what can you more ascribe to chance, than when a broken bow falling from a tree killeth a wayfarer that was passing by it? But the Lord saith, he saith, whereby he comforteth that he hath delivered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doeth not leave the happening of lottes to the blindnesse of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimeth the judgement of them to himself; for he faith that it commeth not to passe by a mans own power that stones are cast into the lap & drawn out againe, but that thing which only might be said to come of chance he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh he them to say of Salomon, the poor man & the vfurter meete together, God lightneth both their eyes. For although poore men & riches be mingled together in the world, while euery one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which giveth light to all men is not blind, & so he exhorteth the poor to patience, because who soever are notcontented with their own state, they seekke to shake of the burthen that God hath laide vppon them. So an other Prophet rebuketh the vnGodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lye in miserie & some arise vp to honour. To come to preferment is neither from the East nor from the West, nor from the South, for God is the judge, he ma-keth low & he maketh high. Because God cannot put of any office of a judge, thereupon the Prophet proueth that by his secret purpose, some are in honour, & others some remaine in contempt.

7 And also I say that the verie particular successes are generally witnes-es of Gods singular prouidence. God raised in the desert a south winde to bring the people plentie of foules: when his picture was to haue Ionas thrown into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tempest. But they that think that God governeth not the world, will say this chaunced beside comon vfe. But thereby I do gather that neuer any wind doth rise or encrease but by the special commandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, that he maketh the winde his messengers, & sicke flames his ministers, he maketh the clouds his chariots, & rideth upon the wings of the winde, vnlesse he did by his wil drue about the clouds & winde, & shewe in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place we are taught that so often as the Sea swelleth with blast of winde, those violences do testiifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth vp the stormie windes & it lifteth vp the waues thereof, & then he turneth the storme to calm,

calme, so that the waues thereof are still. As in another place he faith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendering is naturally giuen to men, yet God willeth it to be imputed to his special grace, that he leauchethe some in barrenness, & vouchsafeth to grant infue to othersome, the fruit of the wombe is his gift. Therefore said Iacob to his wife, am I as God that I can giue thee children? But to make an ende, there is nothing more ordinarie in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the Holy ghost pronounceoth, that not only the growing of the fruits of the earth is the special gift of God, but also that men liue not by only bread, because it is not the very full feeding that nouriseth, but the secret blessing of God: as on the other side he threateneth, that he will breake the stay of bread. Neither could we earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnlesse God did giue us food with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to perswade the faithful, that God in feeding them doth full fill the office of a good father of household, doth put them in mind, that he giueth meat to all flesh. Finally when we haue on the one side: The eyes of the Lorde are upon the righteous, and his cares bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eye of the Lord is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: let vs knowe that all creatures both above & beneath are ready to obedience, that he may applye them to what vs foeuer he wil, whereupon is gathered, that not only his generall providence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his maruellous counsel is applied to a certaine and proper end.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, do caule that this is the learning that the Stoikes teache of Fate or Deftenie, which also was once layde for reproche to Augustine. As for vs, although wee be loth to streyne about words, yet we allowe not this word Fate, both because it is one of those whose profane noveltie Saint Paul teacheeth vs to flee, & because some men doe goe about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the vere opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully layd to our charge. For we do not as the Stoikes do, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of caules which is contained in nature: but we make God the judge and governour of all things, which according to his wisedome hath even from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he woulde doe, and nowe by his power putth in execution that which he hath decreed. Whereupon we affirme that not only the heaven and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and willes of men are so governed by his Prudence, that they be directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then? will one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I aunswere that Basilios Magnus hath truly faide that fortune & chaunce are heathen mens words, with the signification whereof the mindes of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if every good successe be the blessing of God, and every calamity and adversity be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for fortune or chaunce. We ought also to be moved with this saying of Augustine. In his booke against the Academistes he faith: It doeth displease mee that I haue so ofte of named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to have any goddesse meant thereby, but only a chanceable happening in outward things either good or evil. Of which word Fortune are derived those words which no religio forbiddeth vs to vs, forse, forsan, forsan, forjste, fortuie, that is perhaps, peradventure, by fortune & by chancie, which yet must all be applied to the prudence of God. And that did I not leave unspoke when I said, for perchance even the same that is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in things nothing els, but that whereof the reason & cause is unknown. I said this in deede, but it repenteth mee that I did there name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men have a verie evil custome, that when they ought to say, thus it pleased god, they say, thus it pleased fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in his books teach, that the world should be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, & partly by the prudence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subject vnto & ruled by prudence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against convenience of reason, than to say that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for else it should happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that happeneth upon the will of men: and by & by after he plainly faith that we ought not to seek a cause of the will of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be understood, that he well appeareth by one place where he proueth that the will of God is the soueraine & first cause of all things, because nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely hee faineth not God to sit still idle in a watch toure, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he weth an actual will (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

But forasmuch as the dulnesse of our understanding can not by a great way attaine to the height of God's prudence, wee must vs a distinction to help to lift it vp. I say therefore, howsoever all things are ordained by the purpose & certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chanceable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world & men, & indissolubly toseth all things vp & downe (for such beastlineffe ought to be farre from a Christia

A thing may be termed chanceable, and be said to happen by fortune in respect of vs, who see not the cause, when in respect of God, who hath appointed it, it is necessarie, and though not in it owne nature, yet by reason of his appointment incustable.

For they seeme no otherwise, whether we consider the in their own nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge & judgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, y a marchant being entred into a woode in companie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his fellowes, & in his wandering chanceeth upon a den of robbers, lighteth among theues, & is killed, his death was not onely foreseen with Gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre ech mans life should extend, but that he hath set and appointed markes which can not be passed. And yet so farre as the capacite of our minde conceieth, all
Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of things herein seeme happening by chance. What shall a Christian here think? even this, whatsoeuer happened in such a death, he will think it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in deed, but yet he will not doubt that the providence of God did governe to direct fortune to her end. In like manner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are uncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth settled in our hearts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath alreadie foreseen. In this meaning is the name of chaunces oft repented in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men do not attain to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret providence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the hearts of men, but that euen in y darknesse there alway shined some sparkes thereof. So the soothsayers of the Philistians, although they wauet in doubtfulness, yet they atribute aduerseitie partly to God, partly to fortune. If (say they) the arke go that way, wee shall know that it is God that hath striken vs: but if it goe the other way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deed they did foolishly, when their cunning of soothsaying deceiued them, to flee to fortune, but in the mean while we see them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the euell hap which chaunced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his providence turneth all successes whither pleaseth him, may appear by one notable example. Behold euen at one moment of time, when David was found out & neere taken in the desert of Mahon, euen then the Philistians invaded the land, & Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to provide for the safetie of his seruant did cast this let in Saul's way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were fodeine, & beside the expectatie of men, yet may we not say that it came by chaunces. But those things that seeme to vs to happen by chance, faith wil acknowledge to have beene a secret mouing of God. I grant there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but undoubtedly wee ought to beleue, that whatsoeuer changes of things are scene in the world, they come by the secret sttring of the hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely not by the nature of it self. As thereof is a familier example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a body like vnto ours, no wise man will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible that they should be broken: whereby wee see againe that not without cause were in scholes inuented the distinctions of necessitie in respect, & necessitie absolute, of consequent and consequence, whereas God had subject to bricklennesse the bones of his sonne, which hee had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessitie by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue ben.

Wherefore so what end this doctrine is to be applyed, that we may be certain of the profit thereof. Now forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious suttlesties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encomber themselues with entangled gled doubts, who so ever does not know the true and right use of this doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly, to what ends the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the providence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondarily, that the same is in such sort the governor of all things, that sometime it worketh by means, sometime without means, & sometime against all means. Last of all, that it tendeth to this end, God may shew he hath care of all mankind, but especially he doth watch in ruling of his church, which he vouchsaeth more nereely to look vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly favour & bountifulnes of God, or oftentimes ye secret of his judgement do brightly appear in the whole course of his providence yet sometime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our minds, men's matters are turned & whirled about with the blinde way of fortune, or so the flesh stirreth vs to murmur, as if God did to make himself pastime, rose them like tennisse balles. True it is, that if wee were with quiet, & still minds readie to learne, the verie successfe it self would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to train them to his patience, or to correct their evil affections & tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselves, or to awake their drowsinesse: on the other side to ouerthrowe the proud, to disappoynt the surteitie of the wicked, to confound their deuises. But howsoever the causes be secret & vnknowne to vs: we must assuredly holde that they are layde vp in hidden stores with him, & therefore wee ought to cry out with David, God, thou hast made thy wonderful worke so many, y none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward vs I would declare & speake of them, but they are more than I am able to express. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to think vpon our sins, that the verie punishment may move vs to repentance, yet doe wee see how Christ giueth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish every one according to his deservings For of him that was borne blind by faith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glorie of God may be shewed in him. For here natural sense murmureth when calamity commeth even before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserved it. But Christ doth testify in this looking glass the glory of his father doth shine to our sight, if we have cleere eyes to behold it. But we must keepe modestie, that we drawe not God to yelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret judgements, that his will be vndone vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thick clouds do cover the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heausome mistiness is cast before our eyes, & the thunder troublith our cares, & all our senses are amased with terour, wee thinke that all things are confounded & troubled together: yet al the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietnesse and calmenesse that was before. So must wee thinke that while the troublesome state of things in ye world taketh from vs abilitie to judge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doeth in well framed order.
Cap. 17.

order govern & dispose even those verie troublesome motions themselves to a right end. And surely verie monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the works of God to account & examine his secret meanings, & to give an aduised sentence of things unknown, than they will do of the deeds of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modestie toward our egals, y we had rather suspend our judgement than to incur the blame of rashnes, & on the other side proudly to triumph upon the dark judgements of God, which it became vs to regarde with reverence? 2 Therefore no man shall well & profitably way the prudence of God, but he that considering that he hath to do with his creator & the maker of the world, doth with such humilitie as he ought submit himself to fear & reverence. Hereby it commeth to passe, that so many dogs at this day doe with venomed bitings, or at least barking, affaile this doctrine, because they will haue no more to be lawful for God, than their own reason informeth them.

And also they rage at vs with all the spirituallnes y they are able, for that not contented with the commandements of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, the world is ruled by his secret counsels. As though the things that we teach were an invention of our own braines, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doeth every where expressely say the fame, & repeteth it with innumerable formes of speeche. But because some shame restraine them, y they date not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen; they saie that they content with vs, to the ende they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what occureth happeneth in the world, is governed by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere, to what end speaks the scripture faith, that his judgments are a deepse bottomlesse depth. For, whereas Moses crieth out that the will of God is not to be sought afarre of in the clouds, or in the depths, because it is familiarly set forth in the law; it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse deapth. Of the which Paul alfo saith: O deapth of the richnesse & of the wisdom, & of the knowledge of God: how unsearchable are his judgments, & his waiues past finding out: for who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath bee his counsellour? And it is in deed true, that in the gospel & in the law are contained mysteries which are farre above the capacitie of our sense: but forasmuch as God for the comprehension of these mysteries which hee hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth lighten the minde of them that be his, with the spirit of understanding; now is therein no bottomlesse deapth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, & a candle to guide our feete, & the light of life, & the schoole of certaine & plainly discernable truth. But his maruillous order of governing the world, is worthily called a bottomlesse deapth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reverently to worship it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in fewe words. The secret things (faith he) belong to the Lord our God: but the things revealed belong to vs & to our children for ever. We see how he bidde vs not onely to study in meditation of his law, but also reverently to looke vp into the secret prudence of God. And in the booke of Tob is rehearsed one title of this deapth, that it humbleth our mindes.
mindes. For after that the author of that book in surveying vp & down the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the works of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his wayes, but how little a portion heare we of him? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisdom that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisedom that he hath appointed for men. For after he hath preached of ye secretes of nature, he faith that wisedome is known to God only, & is hidden from the eyes of all living creatures. But by and by after, he sayeth further, that it is published to the end it should be searched out, because it is said vn to man; beholde, the feare of God is wisedom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doeth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in only good will we do according to the law, because his providence is an vnchangeable law. Therefore, sith God doth claime vs to himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs vnknown, let this be to vs a law of sobernesse and modestie, quietly to obey his soueraigne authority, that his wil may be to vs the only rule of justice, and the most just cause of all things. I mean not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters do babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his justice from his power, but I mean that providence, which is the governesse of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

3 Whosoeuer shall be framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past wil murmur against God for their aduersitie, nor lay vppon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemmon in Homer did sayn, I am not the cause, but Jupiter and destinie: nor yet againe, as carried away with destinies, they wil by desperation throwe themselves into destruction, as that yong man in Plauus which said: Unstable is the chance of things: the Destinies driue men at their pleasure, I wil get me to some rock there to make an end of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretend the name of God to couer their own mischiefous doings: for so sayeth Lyconides in another comedie: God was the mover. I beleue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I knowe it shoule not so come to passe. But rather they will, search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy ghost, they may travaile to attaine thereunto. And also being readie to followe God, whither soever he calleth, they shewe in deed that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Verie foolishly do prophane men turmoile with their fondneffes, so that they in manner confound heaven & earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it; then it is labour vainly lost in taking heed to our selues. Therefore, whereas one man dareth not venture to go the way he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murthered of the coues: another sendeth for Philistians, & wearieth himself with medicines to succour his life: another forbeareth groffe meates for feare of appeiring his feeble health: another dreadeth to dwell in a ruines house: Finally, whereas men deuide alwayes and endevour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which which they desire; either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the wil of God, or els life & death, health & sicknes, peace and warre, & other things, which men as they couet or hate them, doe by their travaile endeoure to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayets of the faithful are disorder'd, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lord to provide for those things which he hath alreadie decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy al counsel that men do take for time to come as things against the providence of God, which hath determined what hee would have done, without calling them to counsale. And then whatsoever is alreadie happened, they so impute it to the providence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to have done it. As, hath a ruffian flaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that was foreseene & ordained by the Lord, he is a minister of his providence. Hath the sonne carelessly, neglecting all remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not resist God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So al mischious doings they call vertues, because they obey the ordinance of God.

4. But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purposes of men with the providence of God. For as he laugheth to scorn their folly, which boldly doe enterprize any thing without the Lorde, as though they were not ruled by his hande: so in another place hee speaketh in this manner: The heart of man purposeth his way, but the Lorde doeth direct his steppes, meaning that we are not hindered by the eternal Decrees of God, but that under his will we may both provide for our felues, & dispose al things belonging to vs. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limited our life within appointed boundes, hath therewithal left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes & helps to preferue it, hath made vs to have knowledge before hand of dangers, & that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath giuen vs provisions & remedies. Now it is plain to see what is our dutie, that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our dutie is to defende it. If hee offer vs helps, our dutie is to vs them. If he shew vs dangers before, our dutie is not to ruene rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our dutie is not to negligence them. But no daunger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fallall, which by all remedies cannot be overcome. But what if dangers bee therefore not fatal, because God hath assigned the remedies to repulse & overcome them? See how thy manner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that danger is not to be taken heed of, because forasmuch as it is not fatal, we shall escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heed of it, because he will not have it fatal vnto thee. These madde men doe not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counsell and heed is inspired into men by God, whereby they may servfe his providence in preserving of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence and flouth they procure to themselves those evils that he hath appointed for thee. For how how cometh it to passe, that a circumpeft man, while he prouideth for himself, doth wind himselfe out of euils, y hang over him, & the foole periseth by vnaduised rashnes, but for that both folly & wisedome are the instrumentes of Gods disposition on both parts? Therfore it pleased God to hide from vs al things to come, to this end that we should meete with them as things doutful, & not ceasie to set prepared remedies against them, till either they be overcome, or be past all help of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished, that the Providence of God doth not alway shewe it selfe naked, but as God by ying of meanes doth in a certaine maner cloth it.

5 The same men do vnorderly & vnaduisedly draw the chances of time past to the naked providence of God. For because vpun it do hang al things wharsoeuer happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies nor adulteries, nor manslaughter committtment withouthe the wil of God. Why then (say they) shal a thief be punished, for that he spoyled him whom the Lords wil was to punish with povertie? Why shal the murtherer be punished which hath flaine him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe serue the will of God, why shal they be punished? But I denye that they serue the will of God. For we may not say, that he which is carried with an euil minde doth seruice vnto God as commander of it, where in deed he doeth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doeth labour to that ende, wherunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his worde? Therefore in doing of things we must see that same wil of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs only that which he commandeth. If we do any thing against his commandement it is not obedience but obstinacie and transgression. But vnlesse he would we should not do it. I graint. But do we euil things to this end to obey him? But he doth not command vs to do them, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but sorraing with the inremperance of our owne lust, that ofset purpose wee bende our traualie against him. And by these means in euill doing wee serue his iust ordinance, becaufe according to the infinite greates of his wisdom he hath good skil to vse euill instruments to doe good. And see howe foolish is their maner of arguing. They would haue the doers vnpunished for mischewous acts, because they are not committed but by the disposition of God. I grant more: that theeues & murtherers & other euil doers are euill instrumets of Gods providence, whom the Lord doth vse to execute those judgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse thereby. For why shal they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shal they couer their naughtines with his righteousnes? They can do neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselves, they are accused by their owne conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they find al the euil in them selues, & in him nothing but a lawful vse of their euilnes. But he worketh by them. And whencesoever I praiue you, commeth the stinke in a dead carrion, which hath bin both rotted and disclosed by heat of the Sunne? Al men doe see that it is raised by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doeth therefore say, that

The providence of God doth not proue vncouth doers unworthe of punishment. Pro.6.9.

say, that the sunbeames do thinke. So when there resteth in an evil man, the matter and guiltinesse of cuill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vs their seruice at his pleasure? Away therefore with this doggett frowardnesse, which may indeede a farre off barke at the justice of God, but cannot touch it.

6 But these cautions or rather doting errors of phrentike men, shal easilie be shaken away, by godly & holy meditation of the prouidence, which the rule of godlines teacheth vs, so that therof may grow vs, a good & most pleasant fruit. Therefore a Christian heart when it is most assuredly persuadeth of things, so it will consider the inferior causes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the singular prouidence of God doth watch for his preseruation, which prouidence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shal turne to his good & salvation. And because he hath to do first of all, with men, & then with the other creatures, he will assure himselfe that Gods prouidence doth regaine in both. As touching men, whether they be good or cuill, he will acknowledge that all their counsesls, wils, enterprizes and powers are vnder the hand of God, so that it is in Gods will to bowe them whether he list, & to restraine them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular prouidence of God doth keepe watch for the safety of the faithful, there are many and most evident promises to witnesses. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, & he shall nourish thee, & shall not suffer the righteous to fall for ever, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the help of the highest, shal abide in the protection of the God of heaven. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I will be thy shield, a brazen wall: I wilbe enemie to thy enemies. Althogh the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principall entent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doeth with such diligence keepe the waies of the Saints, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therfore as a little before we haue rightfully rejected their opinion which doe imagine an vnierfall prouidence of God, that stoopeth not specially to the care of euerie creature, yet principally it shall be good to reknowledge the same special care toward our soules. Wherupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparowe of least value, doeth fall to the ground without the wil of the father, doeth by & by applicit to this end, that we shold consider that much we doe more worth than sparowes, with so much neere care dooth God provide for vs, & he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to trust that the haires of our head are numbered. What can we with our soules more, if not so much as a hair can fall from our head but by his wil? I speake not only of all mankind, but because God hath chosen his Church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doeth by singular examples shewe his care in gouerning of it.

7 The seruant of God being strengthened with these both, promises and examples, will joyn with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their mindes to good will, or to restraine their malice that it may doe no hurt. For it is the Lorde that that giueth vs fauour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the maliciouffesse of our enemies, he knoweth howe by dierse waies to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceiue no sound or sober aduife, like as hee sent forth Satan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rechabeam madde by the young mens counsell, that hee might be spoiled of his kingdome by his owne folle, Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet he maketh them so afraine & astonishe, that they cannot wil or go about that which they haue conceiued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to goe about that which lust & rage did counsell them, he doth in convenient time breake off their violences, and suffereth them not to proceede to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophel that should haue bene to Davids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne all his creatures for the benefite and safetie of them that be his, yea, and to gouerne the diuel himself, which as we fee durt enterpryse nothing against Iob without his sufferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarily ensueth both a thankfulness of minde in prosperous success of things, and also patience in aduerfitie, & an incredible assurednesse against the time to come.
Whatsoever therefore shal betide vnto him prosperously and according to his hearts desire, all that hee will ascribe vnto God, whether hee see the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by liueelesse creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lorde which hath enclined their mindes to me, which hath joyned them vnto me to be instruments of his goodnesse towards me. In plentie of the fruities of the earth, thus he will thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruities.
In other things he will not doubt that it is the onely blessing of the Lorde, whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes hee will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If any aduerfitie happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his minde to God, whose hande auaileth much to imprent in vs a patiencie and quiet moderation of heart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the fals-hood of his brethren, hee could not have taken a brotherly minde to-warde them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lorde, he forgote the injurie, and inclined to mekeenesse and clemencie, so farre from that of his owne arcorde hee comforted his brethren and faide: It is not you that solde me into Aegypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to save your liues. You in deede thought euil of me, but the Lord turned it to good.
If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom hee was troubled, hee woulde forthywith have bene kindled to reuenge. But because hee did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, hee comforted himsel ne with this most excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So David: when Semee had rayled and cast stones at him, if hee had looked vpon man, hee woulde have incouraged his souldiers to recacquite the injurie. But because hee understode

that Sennacharib did it not without the moving of the Lord: he rather appealed them. Let him alone (said he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse.

With the same bridle in another place still he restrains the intemperance of sorrow. I held my peace (faith he) and became as dumb, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectual remedy against wrath and impatience: surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to think upon the providence of God, that he may alway call back his minde to this point. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not only because it is not lawful to strive against it, but also because he will have nothing but that which is both just & expedient. In summe this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leaving their malice (which would do nothing but enforce our sorrow, & when our mindes to reuenge) should remember to clieme vp vnto God, & learn to beleeue assuredly, that whatsoever our enimie hath mischeeuously done against vs, was both suffered & sent by Gods disposition. Paul to restraine vs from recompensing of injuries doeth wisely put vs in mind, that we are not to wrascle with flesh & bloud, but with the spiritual enimie the Diuel, that wee may prepare our selues to strive with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth armes wel the diuel as al wicked men to strive with vs, & that he sitteth as judge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes & miseries that oppresse vs, do chaunce without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the lawe: whatsoever is prosperous floweth from fountaine of Gods blessing, & that all adversities are his curbings: & let that most terrible warning make vs afraide: If ye walke stubbornly against mee, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishnesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chance that happeneth of both forts. we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This same is the reason, wy Hieremias & Amos did so sharply rebuke the Jewes, because they thought that things as well good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To which purpose serueth that sermon of Ezechiel. I the God that create light & fashion darkness, that make peace and creat euill: I God do make all these things.

9 And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither wil he, because hee thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whose he hath receiued benefit, therefore let them passe vnconsidered, as though they had deserued no thanke by their gentilenesse: but he wil hartily think himselfe bound vnto them, & wil willingly confess his bonde, and trauell as he shall be able, and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefits receiued hee will reverence and praise God as the principal author, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is in deede he will understand that hee is by the will of God bounde to them, by whose hande it was Gods will to be beneficially vnto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, hee will determine in his mind, that the same was done in deede with the will of God, but hee will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sickness whom hee he hath negligently handled, whereas of duetie he should have taken good heed vnto him although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe,yet wil he not therby lissen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his duetie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence.

M ouch leffe when there is vsed any fraud, and conceiued malice of mind in committing either murther or theft,wil he excuse it under pretence of gods providence, but he will in one selfe cuil act seuerally behold both the righteouenes of God, & the wickednes of man, as both doth manifesly shewe themselves. But principally in things to come he wil haue consideration of such inferior causes. For he wil reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may vse for his safeties.

And so he neither wil be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slouthfull in craving their help whom he feeth to haue sufficient whereof may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vse as the lawful instruments of Gods providence. And because he doth not certainly knowe what succession the busines will haue that he goeth about, (fauing that in all things he knoweth that the lord wil provide for his benefite) he wil with studie travaile to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so farre as he can conceiue in mind and understanding.

And yet in taking of counsels he wil not be carried on by his own wit, but will commit & yeeld himselfe to the wisedome of God,that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he wil carelesly rest vpon them, or if he vseth them he wil be afraid as left destitute, for he wil haue his mind alway fastened vpon the Providence of God, neither wil he suffer himselfe to be drawn away from the steadfast beholdinge thereof, by consideration of present things. So though Job acknowledged that the succession of bataille is in the wil and hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slouthfulness but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaued it vnto the Lorde to gouerne the end.

We wil stand valiant (faith he) for our nation, & for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his eyes. This knowledge shal despoile vs of rashnes & wrongful confidence, & shall drive vs to continual calling vp to God: & also shal vphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doute assuredly & boldly to despie thofe dyuers ys compass vs about.

In this point doth the inestimable felicitie of a godly minde shew forth it selfe. Innumerable are the evils that do beseege mans life, and doe threaten him so many deaths. As, not to go further than our felues: for as much as our bodie is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea, hath enclosed & doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man cannot carie himselfe but he must needs alfo carie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, & draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweateth without peril? Now whither soever thou turne theall things that are about thee are not onely vntrustie friends to thee, but do in maner openly threaten & seeme to shewe thee present death. Go into a ship, there is but a foote thickeines betweene K.
Cap. 17. Of the knowledge of thee & death. Sit on horseback, in the slipping of one foot thy life is in danger. Go through the streets of a city: even how many tyres are upon the houses, so many perils art thou subject. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. How many wilebeasts thou feest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou mean to shute vp thy selfe, even in a garden wel fensed, where may appeare nothing but pleasingnesse of ayre and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subject to fire, doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertie, and in the night time with falling vppon thy head. Thy feelde, forasmuch as it lyeth open to hayle, frost, drouth & other tempestes, it warmeth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisons, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part doth besiege vs at home, and part doe followe vs abroad. In these freights must not man needs be most miserable, which even in life halfe dead doeth plainly draw forth a careful and fainting breath, as if he had a sword continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chauncet seldom, or at the least not alwayes, nor to all men, and neuer at once. I grant, but seeing wee are put in minde by the examples of othen, that the same things may happen to our felves, and that our life ought of duty no more to be free than theirs, it cannot be but that we must dread & feare them as things that may light vppon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearfulness? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproch of God to say, that he hath set open man the noblest of all his creatures to their blinde and vnadaufed strokes of fortune. But here my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which he shoulde feele if he shoule be brought subject under Fortunes dominion.

But when that light of Gods Providence hath once shined upon a godly man, he is now releued and delivered not onely from the extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from all care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comfort to understande that the heavenly father doth so holde in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authority & countenance, so ordereth them with his wifedom, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment; and that he is receiued into Gods tuition, & committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the governor to give them place. For so is it song in the Psalm. For he shall deliver thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysome pestilence. Hee will couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt be sure vnder his fethers. His truth shall be thy flieede and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid of the feare of the night, nor of the arrowes that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glorie. The Lorde is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to me. The Lorde is my protector, why shal I be afraid? If whole campes stand vp against me, if I walke in the middeft of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is never shaken.

shaken away from them; but hereby, that where the world seetheth in shew to be without order whirled about, they knowe that God worketh euerie where, whose workes they trust shall be for their preseruation. Now if their safetie be assaiied either by the diuell or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Providence, they must needs be by and by discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the diuell & all the rout of the wicked, are so every way holden in by the hande of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceive any mischief against vs, nor goe about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they goe never so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farre are they shall suffer, yea, so farre as they shall commaunded, & that they are not onely holden fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe service: here haue they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselves. For as it is the Lords worke to armte their furie and to turne and direct it whither it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and ende, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which persuasion Paul being established, did by the sufferance of God appoint his iourney in an other place which hee faide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely faide that he had bene stopped by Satan, he should haue seemed to give him too much power, as if it had bene in Satans hande to overthrow the vrie purposes of God: but when he maketh God the judge, vpon whose sufferance all iourncies do hang: he doeth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoever hee goe about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doeth David, because for the wandrie chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were whirled about, he doth flye to this sanctuarie, saith that his times are in the hand of God. He might haue said either the course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the worde Times, he meant to expresse that howsoever the state of man be vnstedyfast, whatsoever alterations doe nowe and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cause Raphin and the king of Israel, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as firebrandes kindled to waft and consume the lande, are called by the Prophet smoking brandes, which can doe nothing but breath out a little smoke. So when Pharaon was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, strength and number of men, he himself is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God saith that he will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither he list. Finally, because I will not tarrie long vpon this point, if a man marke it he shall easilly se that the extremity of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Providence, and the cheefe blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

12 Concerning the Providence of God, this that is faide were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiousitie of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they bee satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwise than is abowye declared, that God hath not stedfast & stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of God in appointing all things that he is said to repeat him, and that plagues first denounced be afterwards recalled.

of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented of the creating of man, of the advancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that he will repent of the evil that he had determined to lay upon his people, so soon as he perceived any conversion of them. Again, there are rehears'd divers repulses of his decrees. He had declared by Jonah to the Ninevites, that after 40 days once past, Ninevites should be destroyed; but by & by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esai pronounced death to Ezekiel, which he was mov'd by his tears and prayers to deferre. Hereupon many do make argument, that God hath not appointed men matters by eternal decree, but yereely, daily, & hourly pointeth this or that, as every mans desertings are, or as he thinketh it equitie & justice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, error & weakeness. For if no man do wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the caufe that he neede to repent, we can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot avoid it, or that he headlong and unadvisedly runneth into a purpose whereof he by and by forceth himselfe. But that it is so farre from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the verie mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, in the same chapter they are both so joyned together, that the comparison doeth verie well bring the shew of repugnance to agreement. His changing is figuratively spoken, God repented that he had made Saul king, & by after it is added: The strength of Israel shal not ly, nor shal he mov'd with repenting. Because he is not a man he may repent. In which wordes his unchangeablenes is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certain the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall & above all repentance. And his constancie should not be doutfull, his very adversaries have beene copelled to beare him witnes. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not choose but burst out into this saying, he is not like a man to ly: nor as a Sonne of man to be changed, & yt is not possible that he should not do that he hath said, & not fulfill whatsoever he hath spoken.

What meaneth then this name of repentance? even in the same fort that all the other phrases of speach which do describe God vnto vs after the manner of men. For because our weaknesse doeth not reach to his highnes, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed low to our capacitie, that we might understand it. And this is the manner how to frame it low for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceiued of vs. Whereas he himselfe is without all movinge of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth, he is angrie with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angrie, we ought not to imagine that there is any movinge at all in him, but rather to consider that this speach is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemb- lance of one chas'd and angrie so oft as he exerciseth judgement: so ought we to understand nothing else by this worde of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes, are wont to declare that that they mislike them. Because then euery change among men is an amendment of that which misliketh them, and amendment commeth of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God changeth in his works. In the meantime yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth with one continual course that which he had from eternitie foreseen, allowed & decreed, howsoever the alteration seeme sodeine in the eyes of men.

14. Neither doeth the holy hystorie shewe that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Nininius, which had beene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezekiel was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that so construe it are deceived in understanding of threatnings: which although they doe simply affirm, yet by the success it shall be perceived that they conteyned a secrete condition in them. For why did God send Jonas to the Nininius to tel them aforehand of the ruine of their citie? Why did hee by Isaiah giue Ezekiel warning of death? For he might have brought to naught both him & them without sending them any worde of their destruction. Hee meant therefore an other thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it comming a far of. Even this he meant not to have them destroyed, but to have them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Jonas prophesied that Nininius should fall after 40. dayes, was done to this ende that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezekiel, was done for this purpose that hee might obtaine longer life. Now who doeth not see that God meant by such threatnings to awake them to repentance, whomse he made afraide to the ende that they might escape the judgement which they had deferred by their sins? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselues doeth lead vs to this, to understande in the simple threatning a secrete emploied condition which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lorde rebuking the king Abimeleche for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, saith these wordes: Beholde thou shalt die for the woman that thou haft taken, for shee hath a husband. But after hee had excused himselfe, God said thus: Restore the wife to her husbande, for he is a Prophet and shall pray for thee that thou maist liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou haft. You see howe in his first sentence hee vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amends, & in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawn from the first purpose of God, by this that hee made voide the thing which hee had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternal ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishmet he moueth thofe to repentance, whomse his wil is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his wil, no not in his word, sauing that he doth not express the same thing in allables which is yet easie to understande. For that saying of Esay must needes remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoe it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

That God doth so use the service of wick'd men, and doth boweth their mindes to put his judgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

Here ariseth a harde question out of other places, where it is saide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobat, for the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiued how hee working by them, should not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and justly condemneth his ministers. Upon this was devis'd the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering; because many have thought this doubt vnpossible to be dissolved: that both Satan and all the wicked are so under the hande and power of God, that he directeth their malice, vnto what ende it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked doings to the executing of his judgements. And their modestie were peradventure excusable, whom the shew of abfurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they doe wrongfully with a lying defence goe about to deliver the justice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them vnreaonable, that man should by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and so by and by be punished for his blindness. Therefore they seek to scape by this shifte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doeth reject that shifte. As for this that men do nothing but by the secrete commandement of God, and do trouble themselues in vaine with deliberating, vnlesse he do by his secrete direction stablish that which he hath before determined, it is proued by innumerabell and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before alleaged out of the Psalmes, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there saide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causellie with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples will be more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Job wee knowe, that Satan doeth no lesse appeare before God to receive his commandements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In deede it is after a divers manner and for a divers ende: but yet so that hee cannot goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterwaerd to be added a bare sufferance of him to affliet the holy man; yet because that saying is true: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that trial of Job, whereof Satan and the wicked thecues were ministers. Satan goeth about to drive the holy man by desperation to madness. The Sabes cruelly and wickedly doe invade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Job knowledgeeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoever men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their travell to the executing of his judgements. It was Gods will to have the false king King Ahab deceived: the devil offered his service thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commandement, to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madness of Ahab be the judgement of God, then the deuise of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the judge doeth only suffer and not also decree what he wil haue done, & command the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Iews purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate & the souldiers do follow their raging lust, & yet in a solemn prayer the disciples do confess, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hande and counsell of God had determined: even as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose & foreknowledge of God deliuetered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly & willingly appoint that which the Iews did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets y Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Absolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adulterie, committet détestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne work. For the words are these: Thou haft do it secretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vied in Iury, was the worke of God. For which cause Nabuchadnezzer is called the servaunt of God, God every where crieth out that with his hisling, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commandement the wicked are stirred vp to warre. He calleth the Asirian the rod of his wrath, & the axe that he moueth with his hande. The destruction of the holy citie & ruine of the Temple he calleth his work. David not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous judge, yet confesseth that the cursings of Semeli proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord(fay he) commanded him to curse. Wee often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoever happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sones of Jeth, and verie many things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in the Scriptures do see, that for showes of false, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle & tals fondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferance in place of the Providence of God, as though God sate in a watch tower wayting for the chaunces of Fortune, & so his judgements should hang upon the will of men.

2. Now as concerning secret motions, that which Salomon speakest of the heart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surelie to all mankind, & is as much in effect as if he had saide: whatsoeuer we conceiue in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to his end. And truely if he did not worke in the minde of men, it were not rightly saide, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, & wisedome from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander wher is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearful so farre forth as their hearts be taken with his fear. So David went out of the campe of Saul & none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desir'd to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that hee

blindeth the eyes of men, & striketh them with giddiness, that he maketh them drunke with the spirite of drowsinesse, casteth them into madness, and hardneth their hearts. These things also many doe referre to sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate, hee suffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is too fond, forasmuch as the Holy ghost in plaine words expresseth, that they are striken with blindnesse & madness by the just judgement of God. It is said, that he hardned the heart of PHARAO, also that he did make dull and strengthen it. Some doe with an vsauorie cauallation mocke out these phrases of speech, because in another place it is said, PHARAO did harden his owne heart, there is his owne willet for the cause of his hardening.

As though these things did not verie well agree together, although in druers maners, than man while he is moued in working by God, dooth also worke himselfe: And I do turne backe their obiection against themselves. For, if to harden doe signifie but a bare suufferance, then the verie motion of obstinacie shall not be properly in PHARAO. Now how weake & foolish were it so to expound, as if PHARAO did only suffer himselfe to be hardened? Moreover the Scripture cutteth off all occasions from such cauallations. For God faith, I will hold his heart. So of the inhabitants of the land of CANAAN, MOSES faith, that they went forth to battle, because the Lorde had hardened their hearts. Which same thing is repeated by another Prophet, saying: He turned their hearts that they should hate his people. Again in Eovy he faith, that he will send the ASIRIANS against the deceitfull nation, & will command them to carrie away the spoiles, & violently take the pray, not meaning that he will reach wicked & obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his judgements as if they did bear his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appareareth that they were moued by the certaine appointment of God. I graunt that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans serviece as a meane, but yet so that Satan doth his office by Gods mouing, & proceedeth so farre as is given him. The euil spirite troubled SAUL, but it is said that it was of God, that wee may knowe that the madnesse of SAUL came of the just vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blind the minde of the unfaithfull: but how so, but only because the effectuall working of error commeth from God himselfe, to make them beleue lyes that refuse to obey the truth? After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God have deceived him. According to the other maner of speach it is said, that hee giueth men into a reprobate mind: & to cast them into filthie desires, because he is the chiefe author of his owne just vengeance, & SATAN is but onely a minifter thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of free or bond wil of man, I thinke I haue already shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the will of God is faide to be the cause of all things, his Providence is thought the gouernesse in all purposes & workes of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not onely in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirite, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

to slander the heavenly oracles, take heed what manner of judgment they take upon the. For if by faine pretending of ignorance they seek a praise of modesty, what can be imagined more prou'dly done, than to set one small word against the authoritie of God: as I think otherwise, I like not to have this touched. But if they openly speake evil, what prouide they with spitting against the heaven? But this is no newe example of waywardnesse, because there haue bin in all ages wicked & vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall seeke that thing in deed to be true, which long ago the holy ghost spake by the mouth of David, that God may overcome when he is judged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbredled licentiousnesse, that of their owne fil-thinesse they do not only argue against God, but also take vppon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonishteth, that the blasphemies which they vomite against the heaven do not reach vn-to God, but that he driving away the clouds of caullations, doth brightly theewe forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded upon the word of God, it is above all the world) doeth from her high place contemptuously looke downe upon these mystes. For first, where they object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrarie willes, because he decreeth those things by secrete purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is easily wiped away. But before I answere it, I wil once againe giue the readers warning, that this caullation is thrown out not against me, but against the holy ghost, which taught the holy man Job this confession: as it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by the euens, he acknowledged in the injuriue and hurt that they did him, the just scourge of God. What saith the Scripture in other places? The fonnes of Holy obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. A no another Prophet crieth out, that God which fitteth in heauen doth whatsoever he will. And now I haue theewed plainly enough that God is the author of all those things which these judges would have to happen only by his idle suffurance. He testifieth that he createth light and darkenesse, that he formeth good and euill, that no euill hap-peneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tel mee, I beseech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne judgementes? But as Moses teacheth, if he which is flaine by falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the slayer: so the whole church faith in Luke, that Herod & Pilate conspired to do those things, which the hande and purpose of God had decreed. And truly if Christ were not crucifed with the will of God, whence came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doeth friture with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that hee willeth not the thing he wil: but where it is but one and simple in him, it seemeth to vs manifolde, because according to the weakenesse of our witte we conceive not how God in divers manner willeth and willeth not one selfe thing. Paul, after that he hath saide, that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a little after faith further, that in it was manifestly theewed the manifolde wisedome of God: because for the dunenesse of our witte the wisedome of God seemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpretor hath translated it of many fashions:shall we therefore dreame that there is any varietie in God himselfe, as though he either changeth his purpose, or differeth from himselfe? Rather when wee conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe,let vs call to mind our owne weaknesse, and therewithal consider that the light where. in he dwelleth, is not without cause called Inacessible, because it is covered with darknesse: Therefore al godly & seuer men will easilie agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will willem the y which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to have his father to live, whom God will haue to die. Againe it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euil will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an euil sonne willeth to have his father to die, and God also willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, and the other sonne willeth that which God also willeth, and yet the naturalnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrarie thing, than the unnaturalnesse of the other sonne that willeth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to wil doth belong to man, & what to God, & to what end the wil of euery one is to be appli'd, to have it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God willeth we haue brought to passe by the euil willes of euil men. But a little before he had saie, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and al the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselues, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no means so do, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done upon them. Whereupon he crieth out: Great are the works of God, & ought to be sought out of all them that loue them: that in marvellous maner the same thing is not done without his wil which is also done against his wil, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euil, vnlesse for that he is omnipotent, he could of euil make good.

VIII. Wicked men are sufficiently condemned for the euil which they do, although God have appointed it to be done.

4 In the same maner is assoiled or rather vanisht away the other objection: that if God do not onely vs the seruice of wicked men, but also governeth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, & therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his wil & commandement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre a funder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wifes, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonor: yet did he not therefore command the wicked sonne to commit incest, vnlesse perhaps you meane it in respect of David, as he speakeh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, hee doeth not therein commend his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by his wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret judgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deed of their owne owne euill lust they do purposely brake. Now the thing is of God, & is ruled by his secret prouidence, which men doe wickedly, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse, and madnesse of the people is severely condemnaed, for that they perverted the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of Davi'd, and yet we knowe it was his will that he should be appointed. Whereupon in the vorie wordes of Ofse there appeareth a certaine shewe of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdom was erected without his knowledge, and against his wil, in another place he saith, that he gave the kingdom to Iarobeam in his rage. How shall these sayings agree, that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Even thus, because neither could the people fall from the house of Davi'd, but that they must shake off the yoke which God had layed vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vnhankfulness of Salomon. Wee see therefore how God in not willing fall breach of allegiance, yet to another ende justly willeth a falling away from their Prince, whereupon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holy anointing driven to bee king. After this maner doth the holy historie say, that there was an enimie raised vp to spoyle Salomons sonne of part of his kingdom. Let the readers diligently vrey both these things, because it had pleased God to have the people gouerned vnnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was divided in two partes, it was done against his will. And yet the diuision toke beginning of his will. For surely, where as the Prophet both by words & ceremonie of anointing did moue Iarobeam whiche he thought of no such thing, to hope of the kingdom, this was not done without the knowledge or against the wil of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people unjustly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of Davi'd. In this maner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehabeam proudly depriued the request of the people, this was done by God, to confirme the worde which he had spoken by the hand of Ahiba, his feruant. Lo how against Gods will the sacred vntrie is torna in sunder, & yet with the will of the same God tenné tribes do forsake Salomons sonne. Let vs adde another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their hands vnto it, the sonnes of Ahab were slaine, & all his offpring rooted out. Iehu said in deed truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hand of his feruant Elias. And yet not vnjustly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are ye righteous, saith he? if I have conspired against my lord, who hath killed at these? I haue before (as I think) alreadie declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the rightouesnes of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest wittes of Augustine shal alway suffice: where as the father deliuered the sonne, & Christ deliuered his body, and Judas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuerie is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combred with this that wee now saie, that there is no consent of God with man, where man by the righteous moving of God doeth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine faith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these judgements, where God worketh even in the hearts of evil men whatsoever he will, and yet rendreth them according to their deservings? And truly in the fift hod of Infob, it shalbe no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked decee to God; because he himselfe willed him to be delivered; and did deliver him to death, than it shalbe to give away the praise of our redemption to Infob. Therefore the same writer doeth in another place truely tell vs, that in this examination God doeth not enquire what men might haue done, or what they haue done, but what their wil was to do, that purpose and will may come into the account. They that think this hard, let them a little while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacity, & do find fault that those things are uttered, which God vnlesse he had known them profitable to be known, woulde never have commanded to be taught by his Prophets and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meeke willingnesse to learne, and that without exception whatsoever is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more frowardly outrage in prating against it, sith it is evident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer confutation.

The First Chapter.

That by Adams saine and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate; wherein is increated of Original saine.

Not without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe been in the olde proverbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our sences: whereby it commeth to passe, y in taking counsell of any thing necessary, we be miserably daunted, yea, altogether blinded. But

But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heede, that we do not disorderly use it, as we see some of the Philosophers have done. For they in exhorting man to knowe himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he should knowe himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing else doe they Will him to beholde in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our felluc, first standeth in this point, that considering what was given vs in creation, & how bountifully God continueth his graciois favor toward vs, we may knowe how great had bin the excellencie of our nature, if it had continued vncorrupted: and we may withal thinke vpoun this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as it were gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed vpoun vs, that wee may alwayes hang vpon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feling whereof may throw down al glorie & trust of our felluc, overwhelm vs with shame, & truely humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his owne image, to the end to raise vp our mindes both to the studie of vertue & to the meditation of eternal life, so leaft the so great noblenesse of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulnes, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endured with reason & understanding, that in keeping a holy & honest life, wee should proceede on forward to the appointed end of blessed immortalitie. But the first dignitie cannot come in our mind, but by and by on the other side the beauteous light of our filthines, & shame doth thrust it self in presence, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, where upon groweth the hatred & loathing of our felluc, & true humilitie, & there is kindled a new desire to seek for God, in whom euery of vs may recouer those good things, whereof we are found altogether void and emptie.

2. This thing fully the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of our felluc, I meane, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs deftittue of all matter to glorie vpon, may bring vs to submission. Which rule it behoijeth vs to keepe, if we wil attaine to the true mark both of right knowledge & well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good things, than to looke vpon our miserable neediness and dishonor, which ought to overwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coqueteth, than to be stroked with flatterie: and thencefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lightnesse of beleefe: whereby it is so much the lesse to be marueled, yere in the greatest part of men haue perniciously erred. For if there is naturally planted in all mortal men a more than blind love of themselves, they doe most willingly perswade themselves, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this most vaine opinion doth ecch where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of himselfe to make himselfe line well and blessedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, howe fower they graunt some somewhat to God, lest they should seem arrogantly to take all to themselves, yet they so part it, that the principall matter of glorie & confidence alwaye remaineth with themselues. Now if there come talke, that with her allurements tickleth the pride that alreadie of it selfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most favourably advanced the excellencie of mans nature, so hath he beene excepted with the wellusing rejoycement in manner of all ages. But whatsoever such commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to rest in himselfe, it dooth nothing but delite with that sweetnesse, and in deede so deceiue, that it bringeth to môsse wretched destruction all them that affent vnto it. For to what purpose availeth it for vs, standing vpon al vaine confidence to devise, appoint, attempt & go about those things that we think to be for our behoofe, and in our first beginning of enterprise to be forsaken & destitute of sound understanding & true strength, & yet to goe on boldly till wee fall downe into destruction? But it cannot otherwise happen to them that haue affiance that they can do any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man giue heede to such teachers that hold vs in considering only our owne good things, then shall not profite in learning to know himselfe, but shall be carried violently away into the worse kind of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doeth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the second part of wisdome consisteth in the knowledge of our selues, yet in the verie manner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the judgement of the flesh, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe, when trusting vpon his owne understanding & integritie, he taketh boldnesse, and encourageth himselfe to doing the duties of vertue, and bidding battel to vices, travaileth with all his studie to bende himselfe to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh vpon and tryeth himselfe by the rule of Gods judgement, findeth nothing that may raise vp his minde to good affiance; and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoiled of all confidence, he leaueth to himselfe nothing toward the wel ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the first noblenesse that he gaue to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteousnesse and goodnesse. For we cannot consider either our owne first estate, or to what end we are created, but we shall be pricked forward to studie vpon immortallitie, and to desire the kingdom of God. But that consideration is so farre from putting vs in courage, that rather discouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humblenesse. For what is that first estate of ours? euen that from whence wee are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euen the same from which we are altogether turned away: so that lothing our owne miserable estate, wee may groane for sorrowe, and in groining may also sigh for the losse of that dignitie. But nowe when wee say that man ought to beholde nothing in himselfe that may make him of bolde courage: wee meane that there is nothing in him vpon affiance wherof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any lift to heare what knowledge man ought to haue of himselfe, let vs thus diuide it, that first he consider to what ende he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be dispised, by which thought hee may be stirred up to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him way his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiving whereas he may lye in extreme confusion, as one utterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that hee may knowe what is his dutie; and the other, how much he is able to doe towards the performing of it. Wee will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But because it must needs be that it was not a light negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so severely punished, wee must consider the viscerall forme of the fame in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God vpon all mankinde. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly beene receiued, concerning the intemperance of gluttonie, as though the summe and head of all vertues consisted in the forbearing of one only fruite, when there flowed on every side store of all sortes of deitties that were to be desired, & when in that blessed fruifulness of the earth, there was not only plente, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therefore we must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good & euil, was the trial of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proove that he was willingly subiect to the governement of God. And the name of the tree is: selfe the selfe, that that commandeament was giuen for none other ende, than for this, that hee contented with his owne estate should not with wicked lust aduancc himselfe higher. But the promise whereby hee was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as hee did not eate of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatening of Death so soone as hee should taste of the tree of knowledge of good & euil, serued to proove and exercice his faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what means Adam proouked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine in deede faith, not amisse, when hee faith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull & than was permitted him, he might have continued in his estate: but we must fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For the woman was with the deceite of the Serpent led away by infiditie, now it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that al men were loyed by one mans disobedience. But it is whital to be noted, that the first man fell from the subiection of God, for hee not only was taken with the enticements of Satan, but also despising the truth, did turne out of the way to liying. And surely Gods word being once despised, all reverence of God is shaken off. Because his maiestie doeth no other wayes abyde in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inviolate, but while wee hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infiditie was the roote of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned unthankfullnesse, for that Adam in courting more than was granted, did vnderereently despise the great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that that he was made after the likeness of God, unless he might also be made equal with God. If Apoftafie be a filthie and detestable offence, whereby man draweth him self from the allegiance of his creator, yea, outragiously flaketh of his yoke; then it is but vaine to extenuate the sin of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apoftafie, but ioyned with shamefull reproches against God, while they attened to the slaunders of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidellie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstiniate rebellion, to make men cast away the feare of God, and throw themselues whether their lust carried them. Therefore Bernard doth righteously teach that the gate of saluation is opened vs, when at this day wee receive the Gospell by our cares euens by the same windowes, when they stoode open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would never have been fo bolde, as to do against the commandements of God, but for this, that he did not beleue his worde. Truely this was the best bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe rightheousnesse in obeying the commandements of God, and then that the chief end of happie life is to be eulogized of him. He therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the diuell, did as much as in him lay extinguish the whole glorie of God.

5 As the spiritual life of Adam was, to abide joyned and bounde to his creator, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it marueile if he by his falling away, destroyed all his own pofterie, which peruered the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures do groane, saith Paul, being made subject to corruption against their will. If one should ask the cause: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment that man deferved, for whole wfe they were created. Sith then the curse that goeth throughout all the coasts of the world, proceeded from his fault both vpward and downwarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heauenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wifedome, strength, holinesse, truth, and iustice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the most horrible pestilences, blindness, weakenesse, filthinesse, falshood, and inequality, but also hee entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the fame miseries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called original sinne, meaning by this wordesinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they have had much contention, because there is nothing further off from common reason, than all men to bee made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which femeeth to have beene the cause why the olde Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was convenient. And yet that fearfulnessse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophanereiption was that Adam sinned only to his owne losse, and hurted not his pofteritie. So through this fiutletie, Satan went about by hiding the diseafe, to make it incurable. But when it was proued by manifest testimonie of Scrip-
God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 73

Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, hee brought this cauillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men travailed in this point, and about all other Augustines, to shewe that we are corrupted not by forein wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to deny was too great shamelesnesse. But the rauesnes of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme marvelous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shall perceiue, how shamelesse beafts they were in all other things. Surely it is not doughtfully spoken that David confeffeth that he was begotten in infinities, and by his mother conceiued in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodnesse of God toward him, hee beginneth the confeffion of his owne wickednesse at his verie begetting. Forasmuch as it is eviident that that was not peculiar to David alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted vnnder his example. All wee therefore that deffende of vnclene seede, are borne infected with the contagion of sinne, yea, before that wee see the light of this life, wee be in the light of God filthie and spotted. For who could give cleane of the vnclene";fle not one: as it is in the booke of 1ob.

6. wee heare that the vnclene";fle of the parentes do passeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defling we shall not finde the beginning vnclene we go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde vnderlie corrupted: which the Apollie maketh plaine by comparing of him and Chrift. As(fay he) by one man sinne entred into the whole world, and death by sinne, and so death went over all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Chrift, righteousnesse and life is restored vs. What will the Pelagians here prate? that Adam sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue wee no other profite by the righteousness of Chrift, but that hee is an exemple set before vs to followe? Who can abide such robberie of Gods honour? If it be oue of question that Christes righteousness is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth also that they both were fo loft in Adam, as they be recovered in Chrift: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolisht by Chrift. The wordes are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Chrift, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him, & Chrift with his grace restored vs to salvation. In so clear light of trueth, I thinke wee neede not a longer or more laborious profite. So also in the 1. Epistle to the Corinthians, when hee goeth about to stablisshe the godly in the trust of the resurrection, he sheweth that the life is covered in Chrift, that was loft in Adam, he that pronounceth that wee all are dead in Adam, doeth also therewithal plainly testifie, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reache vnto them that were touched with no guiltinesse of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier vnderstan-

ded what he meaneth then by relation of the other member of the sentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough known that the same is done in no other way, than when by miraculous manner of communicating, Christ poureth into vs the force of his righteousness. As it is written in another place, that the spirit is life vnto vs, for righteousness sake. Therefore we may not otherwise expound that which is said that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischief and ruine to himselfe, but also threw downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not only to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected al his seede with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paul could not stande true, that all are by nature the sonsnes of wrath, if they were not alreadie accursed in the wombe. And it is easily gathered that nature is there meant not such as it was created by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient, that God should be made the author of death. Adam therefore so corrupted himselfe, that the infection passed from him into all his offpring. And the heavenly judge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly inough pronounce, that all are borne euil and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatsoever is borne of flesh, is flesh, & that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntil they be begotten againe.

Whether we have our soules or no, by derivation from our parents, as we have our bodies, is a needes full question in this case. It sufficeth vs to know that what God bestowed upon Adam, it was to hold, or to lose, or from, both himselfe & his. That the children of faithful men are sanctified, is no disprove of their originall corruption.

7 Neither for the understanding thereof is any curious disputation needful, which not a little combred the old writers, whether the soule of the sonne doe proceede by derivation from the soule of the father, because in it the infection principally resteth. We must be content with this, that such giftes as it pleased the Lorde to have bestowed upon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after he had received them, he lost them not onely from himselfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be carefull of a conveyance from soule to soule, when hee shall heare that Adam received these ornaments which hee lost, no lesse for vs than for him selfe? that they were not giuen to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not against reason, if hee being spoyled, nature be left naked and poore: if hee being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottenesse into the other twiggges that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the father, that they also were infective to their children: that is to say, so was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continually flowing from one to another, it is conveyed from the ancestors into the posteritie. For the infection hath not her cause in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was so ordeined of God, that such giftes as he had giuen to the first man, man should both have them, and lose them as well for himself as for his. As for this that the Pelagians do cauill, that it is not likely that the children do take corruption from godly parents, if they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleanesse, that is easily confuted. For they descend not of their spiritual regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine saith, whether the vnbelieuer be condemned as guiltie, guiltie, and the beleuerer quite as innocent, they both do beget not innocents, but guilte, because they beget of the corrupted nature. Now where as they do in manner partake of the parents holinesse, that is the special blessing of the people of God, which proseth not but that the first and vnuerseal curse of mankind went before. For of nature is guiltinesse, and sanctification is of super natural grace.

8 And to the ende that these things be not spoken of a thing vnccertaine and vnikownen, let vs define Originall sinne. But yet I mean not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to be most agreeable with truth. Originall sin therefore seemeth to be the inheritably descending peruersefie and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the parts of the soule, which first maeketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the fleshe; and that is is properly that Paul oftentimes calleth sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, theftes, hatreds, murthers, banketings, after the same manner hee calleth the fruities of sinne, albeit they are likewise called sinnes both commonly in the Scriptures, & also by the lamen Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctly to bee noted: that is, that being so in all partes of our nature corrupted and perverted, wee are nowe euen for such corruption onely holden woorthily damned and condemned before God, to whom is nothing acceptable but righteousness, innocencie and pureenesse. And yet is not that bonde in respect of anothers fault. For where it is saide, that by the sinne of Adam wee are made subject to the judgement of God, it is not so to bee taken, as if wee innocent and vndeferring did bear the blame of his fault. But because by his offending wee are all clothed with the curse, therefore is it saide that hee hath bounde vs. Neverthelesse, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection distilld from him; abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is justly due. Wherefore howe so ever Auguistine doeth often times call it an others sinne, (to the we the more plainly, that it is conveyed into vs by propagation) yet doeth hee also affirm withall that it is proper to euerie one. And the Apostle himselfe expressely witnesseth, that therefore death came vpon all men, because all men haue finned, and are wrapped in Originall sinne, and defiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the verie infantes them selues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by an others, but by their owne fault. For though they haue not as yet brought forth the fruities of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the seede therof enclosed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certain seede of sinne: therefore it cannot be but hatefull & abominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly accounted sinne before God: for there could be no guiltinesse without sinne. The other point is, that this peruersefesse never caufeth in vs, but continuallybringeth forth newe fruities, even the same workes of the fleshe that wee haue before described: like as a burning furnace bloweth, out flame and sparcles, or as a spring doeth without ceasing cast out water. Therefore they which haue defined

Original sin, to be a lacking of original righteousness which ought to have been in us, although in deed they comprehend all that is in the thing itself; yet they have not fully enough expressed the force and efficacite thereof. For our nature is not only bare and empty of goodness, but also is so plentiful and fruitfull of all evils, that it cannot be idle. They, that have saide, that it is a concupiscence, have vied a word not very farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the most part, that whatsoever is in man, even from the understanding to the will, from the soule to the flesh, is corrupted and stuffed full with this concupiscence; or, to ende it shortlyer, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupiscence.

9 Wherefore, I haue saide that all the partes of the soule are possessed of sinne,

The vrie understanding of man is corrupted & not the sensuall or inferior parts only.

so desireth Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteousness. For not only the inferior appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possest the vrie castle of his minde, and pride peirced to the innermost part of his heart. So that it is a solid and foolish thing, to restrain the corruption that proceedeth from thence, only to the sensual motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture, that allureth, stirreth and draweth to sinne only that part, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath disclofed his grosse ignorance, which seeking and searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paul witnesseth not properly in deed, but because it more appeareth in the flesh, as though Paul did meane only a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernatural grace. And Paul there taketh away all doubts teaching that corruption resteth not in one part alone, but that nothing is pure and cleanse from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doeth not only condemn the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but specially travelleth to prove that the understanding mind is subject to blindness, and the heart to perversitie. And the same third Chapter to the Romans is nothing else but a description of original sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirit which is compared with the old man and the flesh, doth not only signify the grace whereby the inferior or sensual part of the soule is amended, but also containeth a full reformation of all the partes. And therefore Paul doth command not only that our grosse appetites he brought to naught, but also that we our selves be renewed in the spirit of our mind, as likewise in another place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newenesse of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the same parte wherein most of all thineth the excellency and noblenesse of the soule, is not only wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not only to be healed, but in manner to put on a newe nature. How faire sinne possest both the understanding minde and the heart, we will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foote is so overwhelmed as with an overflowing of water, that no part of him is free from sinne, & that therefore whatsoever proceedeth from him is accoumpted for sinne as Paul saith, that all the affections of the flesh or thoughts, are enmities against God, and therefore death.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sinnes, because wee say that men are naturally sinfull. They doe wrongfully feek the worke of God in their owne filthinesse, which they ought rather to haue fought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet found & uncorrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne flesh and not of God, forasmuch as wee perishd by no other meane but by this, that wee descended from our first estate. But yet let not any man here murmur and say, that God might haue better foreseen for our salvation, if he had provided that Adam should not haue fallen. For this objection both is to be abhorred of all godly mindes, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secrete of predestination which shall after be entreated of in place convenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that wee accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in deed it is, that the same deadly wound sticketh fast in nature; but it is much materiall to knowe, whether it came into nature from elsewhere, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is evident that the wound was given by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why we should complaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes faith: This haue I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they haue sought many inventions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as having gotten vprightenesse by the goodness of God, hee by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

11 We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse natural, but such as proceeded not from nature. Wee deny that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall propertie that hath bene put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it Naturall, that no man should thinke that every man getteith it by euill custome, whereas it holdeth al men bound by inheritably descedning right. And this we do not of our owne heads without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath, Howe could God, whom all his meanest works do please, be wrathfull against the noblest of Eph. 2.3. all his creatures? But he is rather wrathfull against the corruption of his worke, than against his worke it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly saide to be by nature abominable to God, it shalbe also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustinus feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes naturall, which do necessarily reign in our flesh where the grace of God is absent. So vanishe away the foolish trifling deuise of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse haung substance in man, presumed to forge for him a new Creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous god the cause and beginning of euill.

That man is now spoiled of the Freedome of euill, and made subject to miserable bondage.

Sith we have scene, that the dominion of sin, since the time that it holden the first man bound unto it, doth not only reign in all mankind, but also wholly possesseth every soule; now must we more neere ly examine, since we are brought to that bondage, whether we be spoiled of all freedome or no: and if yet there remaine any parcell, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the ende that the truth of this question may more easily appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shalbe the best way to avoid error, if the dangers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from all prightnesse, by and by hee thereby taketh occasion of slouthfulnes; and because it is said, that by himselfe he can doe nothing to study of righteounes, forthwith he neglegeth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing vnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it never so little, but that both Gods honor shalbe thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be overthrownne with rash confidence. Therefore to the ende we strike not vpon these rocks, this courfe is to be kept, that man being enforced that there remaineth in him no goodnesse, & being on every side compassed about with most miserable necessity, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is void, and to the libertie whereof he is depriued, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulnes, than if it were fained that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessarie this second point is, every man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controversy, it ought then plainly to stande for true, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his own, as farre as it behoveth him to be threwne downe from falfe boasteing of himself: For if it were not granted to man to glorie in himself even at that time, when by the bountifullnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornamentes, how much ought he now to be humbled, far for his unthankfulness hee is thrust downe from his glorie into extreme shame? At that time (Isaye) when he was adauanced to the highest degree of honor, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that hee was created after the image of God, whereby it secretly teacheth, that man was blest, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and desitue of all glorie, doe acknowledge God, to whose liberalitie hee could not be thankfull when hee flowed full of the richesse of his graces; and that now at length with confession of his owne povertie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profit, that all praise of wisedome and strength be taken from vs, as it pertaineth to the glorie of God that they joine our ruine with the robberie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when wee are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on hee on a staaffe of a reede, that it may by and by brake, and we fall to the grounde? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staaffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men haue imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather throwne downe headlong, than stabiliestablished by them that defend it. This I thought needfull to speake before, as by way of preface for many mensakes, which when they heare man's power overthrown from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, do much hate this maner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion necessarie, & for vs most profitable.

2 Whereas we have a little before said, that in the understanding mind, & in the heart are placed the powers of the soule, now let vs consider what they both are able to do. The Philosophers in deede with great consent do imagine that in the understanding minde is fitteth reason, which like a lamp giueth light to al counsels, & like a Queene governeth the will, for they say that it is so endued with divine light, that it can giue good counsell, & so excelleth in lively force that it is able well to gozern. On the other side, that sense is dull & blare eyed, that it alway creepeth on a ground, & walloweth in grosse objects, & neuer lighteth vp if selfe to true light. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reason, & do not yield it selfe to sense to be subdued, is carried on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, & is transformed into will; but if it giue it selfe subject into the bondage of sense, it is by it corrupted and perverted, so that it degendeth into lust. And wher as by their opinion there doe fit in the soule those powers that I haue spoken of before, understanding, sense, appetite or will, which worde will we nowe more commonly vsed, they say that understanding is endued with reason, the best gozernesse toward good and blessed life, so that it doe holde it selfe within his owne excellencie, & thew forth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called sense, wherewith man is drawn to error & deceit, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason, & by little & little be vanquished. They place will in the midst between reason & sense, as a thing at her own ordering, and having libertie whether it lust to obey to reason, or giue forth it selfe to be rauished by sense.

3 Sometime in deede they do not denote, being overcome by verie experience, howe hardely man stablisheth reason to raigne as Queene within himself, while sometime he is tickled with entisements of pleasure, sometime deceived with false semblance of good things, sometime importunately striken with immoderate affections, & violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or strings of snowes, as Plato faith, For which reason Cicero faith, that these sparkes giuen by nature, are with peruerse opinions and eun maners by and by quenched: But when such diseases haue once gotten places in the minde of men, they graunte that they doe more outrageously overfow, than that they easilie may be restrained: and they stick not to compare them to wild horses which throwing away reason as it were casting the Chariot druen, do range unrulyed & without measurie. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (say they) it be in our choise to do this or that, then is it also in our choise not to do. Now if it be in our choise not to do, then is it also to do, but of free choise we seeme to do those things that we do, and to forbeare those things that we forbeare. Therefore if we doe any good thing when we will, wee may likewise leave it undone: if we do any euil, we may also eschewe the same. Yet some of them have burst forth into so great licentiousness, that they have boasted that it is in deed God's gift that we live, but our own that we live well and holily. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta: because every man himselfe getheth vertue to himselfe, therefore never any of the wise men did thanke God for it. For (faith he) for vertue wee be praised, & in vertue wee glorie, which should not bee if it were the gift of God, & not of our selves. And a little after: This is the judgement of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisdom to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers: that the reason of man's understanding is sufficient for a right government: that Will being subject to it, is in deed moved by Senec to evil things. But even as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4 Among the Ecclesiastical writers, albeit there have been none that did not acknowledge both that the soundness of reason in man hath beene some where wounded by sinne, and his will exceedinglie entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them have too much ailed to the Philosophers, of which the auncient, as I thinkke, did so much aduance the streight of man upon this consideration, lest if they should have expressly confessed his weaknesse, first they should have made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them; and then leste they should give to flesh which of it selfe was dull to goodnes, a new occasion of slothfulness. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurditie in the common judgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture suffice to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, not to make place for slothfulness, appeareth by their owne words. Chrysostome hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill things in our owne power, hee hath given vs Freedom of election, and hee withholdeth not the unwilling, but embraceth the willing. Againe, Oftentimes he that is euill, if hee will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slothfulness falleth and becometh euill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layeth not necessitie upon vs, but giveth convenient remedies, suffireth all to lye in the mynde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse wee be holpen by the grace of God, wee can never doe any thing well: so vnlesse wee bring that which is our owne, wee cannot obtaine the favour of God. And hee had faide before, that it should not be all of God's helpe, but wee must also bring something. And this is commonly a familiar word with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeeth that which Hierom sayeth, that it is our part to begin, but Gods to make an ende. Our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see nowe that in these sayings they gave to man towards the studie of vertue more than was meant, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in vs. But if they did prove that in it onely wee sinned, with what apt handling they have done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other and and among them principally Chrysostome have passed measure in aduancing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or waver, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore wee will not tary vpon exact reckoning of euery one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of euery one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euery one for himselfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worfe & worfe, till it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his fensiball part, and to have reason altogether, and will for the more part vn corrupted. In the meane time this shewe about in all mens mouthes, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundredth man did euenv slenderly understand. As for my parte, if I would plainely shewe of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these worde. But it is much materiall that it be heedfully wedy what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoiled of his supernaturall gifts, is able to do. They therefor which boasted themselves to be the disciples of Chrift, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill stil remained among the Latines, as if man had stil abiden in vn corrupted state. And the Greeks were not ashamed to vse the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe. Because therefore al, euyn to the common people, had received this principle, that man was endued with Free will, & many of them that would shewe excellent, cannot tel how farre it extendereth: first let vs search out the force of the word itself, & then let vs proceede by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shewe what man is able to do of his owne nature, toward good or euil. What Free will is, where as it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet fewe have defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he faid, that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euil, and a power of will to choose either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euil when grace ceaseth. Bernard, while he meaneth to speake more subtilly, speake more darkely, which sayeth, that it is a consent by reason of the libertie of wil that cannot be lost, & the judgement of reason that cannot be auoyded. And the definition of Augustinus is not familiar enough, which faith that it is a power to kepe uprightnesse for it self. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Scholemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they faie that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring alfo of their owne such things as they thought either to be better, or to serue for plainer declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to be referred to reason, whose part is to discerne betwene good and euil things: and the adiective Free, pertaineth properly to will, which may be turned

to either of both. Wherefore, faith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas sayeth, that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of understanding & appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue wee in what things they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to say, in reason and will. Now remaineth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

5 They are commonly wont to make subject to the free determination of man, things meane, that is which belong not to the kingdom of God: but they do referre true righteousness to the special grace of God & spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the author of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shewe, he recketh vp three fortes of Willes, the first Sentiuie, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he sayeth, that man hath the first two at his owne libertie, the last is the worke of the holy Ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shalbe entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of free will, they principally seeke not what it is able to do to civil or outward doings, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shewe a good reason. There hath bene a distinction receiued in Schooles, that recketh vp three fortes of freedomes, the first from necessitie, the second from sinne, the third from miserie. Of which the first is naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sin. This distinction I willingly receive, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfully confounded with compulsion: betwene which two how much difference ther is, and how necessitie that difference is to be considered, shal appeare in another place.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controversie that man hath not free will to do good works, vnlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe vpon these phantastical men, which babble that grace is offered generallie and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether depriued of power to do well, or whether he haue yet some power, although it be but little & weake, which by it selfe in deede can do nothing, but by helpe of grace doeth also her part. While the Master of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he sayeth there are two fortes of grace necessarie for vs, whereby wee may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby wee effectuallie will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which disti... second part of the division, the doubtfulnes of speach offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore work together with the Second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make void the first grace by refusing it, or to confirm it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus express it, that it is free for them, that we judge of the judgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be worthy reward not to have departed, & that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to have not been done. These two things I had to note by way, that now, reader, thou mayst see how much I dissent from the soundest fort of the schoolem. For I do much farther differ from the later Sophisters, even so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sort as it is, we perceive by this division, after what manner they have given free will to man. For an length Lombard saith, that we have not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to doe or to think good and evil, but only that we are free from compulsion: which freedom is not hindered, although we be perverse and the bondmen of sinne, & can do nothing but sinne.

7. Therfore, man shall be said to have free will after this sort, not because he hath a free choice as well of good as of evil, but because he doth evil by will, and not by compulsion. That is very well saide: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proud a title? A goodly libertic forsooth, if man be not compelled to serve sinne: so is he yet a willing servant that his will is helden fast bound with the fetters of sinne. Truely I do abhorre stsplitting about words wherewith the Church is vainly wearied, but I thinke that such wordes are with great religious carefulnesse to be taken heed of, which founde of any absurditie, specially where the error is hurtful. How fewe I pray you, are there, which when they heare that free will is assignd to man, do not by and by conceive, that he is lord both of his owne mind & will and that he is able of himself to turne himself to whether part he will? But some one will say: that perill shall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsitie, he will sooner conceive an error of one little word, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we have a more certaine experience in this verie worde, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in manner that came after, while they sticke upon the natural signification of the worde, have bin caried into a trust of themselves that bringeth them to destruction.

8. But if the authoritie of the fathers do move vs, they have in deed continually word in their mouth, but they do withal declare, how much they esteeme the vs of it, First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angerie with them, denie free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he saith only, Let not any man be so bolde to deny the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in another place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subject to lustes that do binde and conquer it.

That the fathers who in consideration before alleged Section 4, seem sometimes to furnish man with armour, do not with standing give the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost.

Again, that when will was overcome with sinne whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Again, that man having ill used his free will, left both himself & it. Again, free will is become captiviue, that it can do nothing toward righteousness. Again, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Again, that the justice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his own strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and man will not free, but made free by God obeyeth.

And of all these things he shortly rendeth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man received great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that he had shewed that free will is stabilisèd by grace, he sharply inteyeth against them that take it upon them without grace. Why therefore (faith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their own strength if they be already made free? And they mark not that in the verie name of free will is mention of freedom. But where the spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boast them of their owne works? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondservants, which faith: Without mee ye can do nothing? Befide that also in another place hee seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he sayeth, that was in deed free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondservant of sinne. Which saying in another place hee repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousness, but by choyse of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Saviour. Hee that doeth restitution, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousness, seemeth trumly to mock at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by mee for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefite to the church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would wish other, if they ask me counsell, to forbear it.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great preiudice against my selfe, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiastical writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doubtfully or diversly in this matter, that no certeinty can be had out of their writings. For some wil so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from givinge any voyece herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wittes provided for, which if they wait upon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alwaye wauer vn certaine. In such sort doe they sometime teache, man being spoiled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnishe or seeme to furnishe him with his owne armour, but it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doubtfullnesse of speeche, they nothing, or verie little esteeming mans strength, haue given the praisse of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certain sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so often repeateth, that we ought to glorie of nothing, because we have nothing of our own, but that man wholly despoyled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vpon God. What meane that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall live; and that the tree of knowledge of good and euel, is the free choose of wil, whereof who so faith, forsaking the grace of God, he shall dye? What meane that of Chrysostom, that every man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinner? If we have no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinner: if it be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to do, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God and man? Could rehersed of this forte soe many sayings out of other, but least any man should eauil, that I choose out those things only that make for my purpose, and doe craftily leave out such things as make against mee, therefore I do forbeare such rehearsal. Yet this Dare affirm, howsoever they be sometime to busie in advancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turried away from truth of his owne power, to have his strength repouled in God alone. Nowe correll to the simple settting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

But I am here constrained to repeat that, which in the beginning of this Chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is moiste discouraged and thrown downe with conscience of his owne miserie, neediness, nakednesse and shame, so hath he best profited in knowledge of himselfe.
For there is no danger to be feared, lest man will take too much from him-selve, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recovered in God; but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his owne right, be it neuer so little, but that he shall destroie himselfe with vaine confidence, and conuys-ing the honor of God to himselfe, become gildie of hainous sacriledge. And truly so oft as this lieth inuaded the mind, y we desire to have somwhat of our owne, which may rest in our felues rather than in God, let vs knowe that this thought is ministred vs by no other counsellor, but by him that perusaded our first parents, to have a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good & euel. If it be the word of the duell that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs gieue no place vnto it, vnlesse wee lift to take counsell of our enemie. It is pleasant to heare, for a man to have so much strengthe of his owne, y he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many fore sentences make vs afraid, by which we be thrown downe; as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in man, & setteth fleth to be his arme. Again, y Ge hath not pleasure in the strengthe of a horte, neither deliteith in the legs of man, but deliteith in them that feare him, & attend vpon his mercy. Again, that it is he which giueth strengthe vnto him that fainteth, & vnto him that hath no strengthe, he encreaseth power, even the yong men shall faint & be weare, and the yong men shall stumble and fall, but they that wait vpon the Lord, shall reuene their strengthe. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strengthe, but it neuer so little, if we meane to haue God favourable vnto vs, which resistenth the proud, & giueth grace.
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of grace to the humble. And, then again, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will pour out water upon the thirstie, and Fords vpon the dry ground. Again, Alle ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises do testify, that none are admitted to receive the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne pouerie. And such promises are not to be passed over, as is that of Efsay: Thou shalt have no more sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shalbe thine euerlafting light, & the God thy glorie. The Lord in deed doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his servants, but because he will himselfe alone appeare glorious in them, hee calleth their confidence farre away, even from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

11 Truely, that saying of Chrysfortome hath alway exceedingly well pleased mee, that the foundation of our Wisedome is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, as (layeth hee) that fame Rhetoriician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the seconde, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the thirde, he answered Pronunciation: if one ask mee of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Seconde, and Thirde time, and alwaies I woulde answere Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some little vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and hautiness of minde, but when he truely feeleth himselfe to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place hee declareth. Let no man (layeth hee) flatter himselfe: of his owne he is a diuell. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for rightouenesse is Gods. Againe, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maymed, troubled and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defence. Againe, when every man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe hee hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the warres are ceas'd. But it is needesfull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shivered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. Howe much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receiueth thee. So vpon the three score and tenne Psalmes hee forbiddeth vs to remember our owne rightouenesse, that wee may acknowledge the rightouenesse of God: and hee sheweth that God doeth so commend his grace vnto vs, that wee may knowe our selues to be nothing, that wee stand onely by the mercie of God, when of our selues wee are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore strive here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our saluation which is given to him. For as our humbleness is his hienesse, so the confession of our humbleness hath his mercy readie for remedie. Neither yet do I require that man not convinced should willingly yeeld himselfe: nor if hee hath any power, that hee should turne his minde from it, to be subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the disease of selfe loue and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, hee thinketh too highly of himselfe, hee should well consider himselfe in the true true looking glasse of the Scripture.

And the common saying which they have borow'd out of Augustine pleaseth mee well, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernatural he was made empitie. For in this latter part of supernatural gifts, they understand as well the light of faith as of righteousness, which were sufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternal felicitie. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdom of God, he was also deprived of the spiritual gifts, wherewith he had beene furnished to the hope of eternal salvation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdom of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, until by grace of regeneration he recover them. Of that sort are faith, the love of God, charity towarde our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteousness. All these things, because Christ restoreth them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Again, soundnesse of the understanding minde and vprightnesse of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of natural gifts. For though there remaine somewhat left of understanding and judgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our understanding is sound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesse. And as for our will, the perusernes thereof is more than sufficiently knowne. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth between good and euel, whereby he understandeth and judgeth, is a natural gift, it could not be altogether destroyed, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that soule ruines thereof appeare. In this sense doeth John say, John. 15, that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainly expressed, that in the perverted and degendered nature of man, there shine yet some sparkes that is, that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from brute beasts, because he is endued with understanding: and yet that this light is choked with great thickenesse of ignorance, that it cannot effectuallly get abroad. So will, because it is inseparable from the nature of man, peryth not, but was bounde to peruser desires, that it can conceit no good thing. This in deed is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceed according to that first distinction, wherein we deuided the soule of man into understanding and will, let vs first examine the force of understanding. So to conclude it of perpetuall blindnesse, that a man leaves vnto it no manner of skill in any kindes of things, is not onely against the worde of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For wee see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out truth, to which he would not aspire at all, but having felt some savour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans understanding, that he is naturally drawn with love of truth, the negligence whereof, in brute beasts produeth a grosser sense without reason: albeit, this little desire, such as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the witte of man cannot for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out truth. truest, but strayeth in diverse errors, and as it were groping in darkness, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanish away; so in seeking truth, it doeth bewray how vain it is to seek and finde truth. And then it is fore troubled with another vanity; that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it was expedient to bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with fonde curiosity, in searching out things superfluous and nothing woorth; and to things moste necessarie to be known, it either taketh no heed, or negligently or feldome turneth, but surely straie at any time applyeth her studies carresly vnto them. Of which peruerfeness, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complain, it is found, that all men have entangled themselves with it. Wherefore Salmom in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all those studies, in which men think themselves to bee verie wise, yet hee pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

Yet doe not all traualles of Witte so alway become voide, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferior things. Yea, and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some little of the higher things, howsoever it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vnpe above the compasse of this present life, then is it principally convinced of her owne weakenesse. Wherefore, that wee may the better see how farre according to the degrees of her ability, it proceedeth in every thing, it is good that I put forth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one understanding of earthly things, an other of heavenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concern God and his kingdom, true righteousnesse, and the blessednesse of eternal life, but have all their respect and relation to this present life, and as it were contained within the boundes thereof. Heavenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Of the first sort are policie, governance of household, all handy craftes, and liberall Sciences. Of the seconde sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this wee must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies together: hee is also by natural inclination bent to cheerish and to preserve the fellowship of these companies, therefore we see that there are in the minde of all men universal impressions of a certaine civil honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that understandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiued not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that fame perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vnerto lawes, because the seedes thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I wyen not the diffentions and fightings that afterward arise while some desire to peruerre lawe and right, the loose absolute government of Kings, that lust strayeth abroad in stead of right, as theeues and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that that to be nuiſſe, which other have stablished for iſſt: and on the other side stiffly faye, that to be laudable, which other have forbidden. For these men doe not therefore hate lawes, because they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie iſſt, doe fight againſt manifest reaſon, and for their fanſie doe abhorre that, which in understanding of minde they allowe. The latter fort of it strewing in such, that taketh not away the firſt conceiving of equitie. For when men doe ſtriue among themſelves, concerning the pointes of lawes, they agree together in a certaine ſumme of equitie. Wherein is prooued the weakenesſe of mans wit, which even then when it ſeemeth to followe the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but ſtill this remaineth true, that there is none in all men a certaine feede of politike order. And that is a large proſee, that in the orderings of this life, no man is voide of the light of reaſon.

14 Nowe do followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesſe, in them also doeth appeare the force of mans wit: but albeit, all men be not apt to learn them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the comon natural power, that there is almoſt no man founde, whose conceiſe of witte doeth not in some arte or other ſeue foorth it ſelſe. Neither haue they onely a power or facilite to learn, but also to deuie in euery arte some newe thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath bene learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it mooued Plato erroni-ously to teach, that ſuch conceiſing is nothing else, but a calling to remebrance, so by good reaſon it ought to compell vs to confede, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. These pointes therefore doe plainly teftifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an uniuerſall conceiſing of reaſon and of understanding. Yet is it to an uiiuer-ſall beneſte, that therein euery man ought for himself to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankenenesſe the creatour himſelfe dooth sufficienſe awake vs, when hee createth naturall fooles, in whom he ma-keth vs to see with what giſtes mans soule excelleth, if it bee not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free giſte of his liberalitie towards euery man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the same arte, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a fewe, is no perfect argument of the common conceiſing of wit, yet because without difference it hap-neſte to the godly and vngodly, it is rightly reckened among naturall giſtes.

15 So oft therefore as we light uppon profane writers, let vs be put in minde by that maruellous light of trueth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, howe much focuer it be peruerfed and fallen from the fir-ſt integritie, is yet still clothed and garniſhed with excellent giſtes of God. If we consider that the spirite of God is the onely fountaine of trueth, we will neither refuse nor deſpire the trueth it felſe, whereoeuer it shall appear, except we wil dishonourably vfe the spirite of God: for the giſtes of the holy Ghost cannot befet light by, without contempt and reproach of himſelfe:

M. And
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of

And what? Shall we deny that the truth shineth to the old Lawyers, which have set forth Civil order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blind both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall we say that they had no witte, which by setting in order the arte of speach, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which in letting forth Phisicke, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? Shall we think them doing errors of madde men: no, rather we cannot read the writings of the old men, concerning these things, without great admiration of their witte. But shall we think any thing praise worthie or excellent, which wee doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs be ashamed of so great vnthankefulnesse into which the heathen Poets fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good artes, were the inventions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whome the Scripture calleth natural men, were so sharp and deepseight in searching out of inferiour things, let vs learn by such examples, how many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath been spoyled of the true God.

The knowledge of artes and sciences is the gift of the spirit of God: neither is it to be neglected, although before God it be but a vanishing transient thing.

Exo.31,3 & 35. 30.

16 But in the meanes time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good gifts of the spirit of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde hee dealeth abroad to whom it pleaseth him. For if it be thought, that the understanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, should be powred into Befeele and Olibh by the spirit of God, it is no marvel if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be saide to be communicated vnto vs by the spirit of God. Neither is there cause why any man should ask, what haue the wicked to doe with Gods spirit, which are altogether estranged from God. For where it is saide that the spirit of God dwelleth in the faithful onely, that is to be understood of the spirit of sanctification, by the which we are consecrate to God himselfe, to be his temples: yet doth he neverthelesse fill, move and quicken all things with the vertue of the same spirit, and that according to the propertie of every kind which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue beene the Lordes will that we should be holpen by the trauell and seruice of the wicked in natall Philosophie, Dialectike, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let vs see it, least if wee neglect the gifts of God, willingly offered in them, wee suffer just punishment for our slothfullnes. But least any should thinke a man to be blessed, when vnnder the elements of this world there is granted vnto him so great an abilitie to conceive truth, it is also to be added that all this power to understand, & the understanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transient thing before God, where is not a stedfast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truely, whome(as we haue saide) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Scholemen are compelled to assent vnto, as the faire gifts were taken from man after his fall, so these natall gifts which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselves in as much as they come from God, but because they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that that he should have no praise of them.

17 Let this be the summe: that it is seene that in all mankinde is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beasts, as brute beasts do differ in sense from things without life. For whereas they be borne certaine natural foolis and idiots, that default obserueth not the generall grace of God: but rather by such sight we are put in mind, that what is left vnto vs, ought justly to be ascrib'd to the kindnesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpness of conceiving, some other doe passe in judgement, some haue a quick'er wit to learn this or that arte: in this varietie God setteth forth his grace vnto vs, that no man should claime to him selfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becometh one more excellent than another, but that in common nature might appeare aboue other the special grace of God, which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bound to none. Beside that, God poureth in singuler motions, according to the calling of every man. Of which thing wee meeete with many examplcs in the bookes of the judges, where it is saide, that the spirite of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in every noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose hearts the Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdom was prophesied of, Samuel said thus: The spirite of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be an other man. And this was continued to the whole course of gouvernement: as after it is spoken of David, that the spirite of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea in Homer men are saide to excell in wittie, not onely as Jupiter hath dealt to every man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amazed as were most sharpe and deepe wittied, that the wittes of men are in the hand & will of God to rule them at every moment: for which reason it is saide, that he taketh wit from the wife, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some marks of the Image of God, which do make difference betwene all mankinde and other creatures.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdom of God and to that spirittuall inight, which consisteth chiefly in the seare things: to know God, and his fatherly favour toward vs, wherein our salvation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his lawe. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than molles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken, but yet such as doe alway favour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gave them in deed, as is aboue said, a little taft of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodlineffe: and many times he moved them to speake many things, by confession whereof them selves might be conuinc'd: But they so sawe the things that they saw, that by such seing they were not directed to the truth, much lesse did attaine to common inducmen with reason, so he doth particularly for special purposes poure special motions into them.

Cap.z. Of the knowledge of to it, like a wayfaring man in the midst of the field, for a sodaine moment, seeth farre and wide the glittering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing light, that he is sooner covered againe with the darkness of the night, than he can take his foote, so farre it is off that he can be brought into his way by such a help. Beside that, those sense droppes of truth, wherewith as it were by chance, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they never so much as smelled that assuredness of God's good will toward vs, without which man's witte must needes be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore man's reason neither approceth, nor goeth towards, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to understand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

19 But because wee being drunke with a false persuation of our owne deepe insight, do verie hardly suffer our selves to be persuaded, that in matters of God it is utterly blinde and dull: I thinke it halbe better to confirm it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doth John verie well teach in that place which I euen nowe alleaged, when he wroteth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not. He sheweth in deedes, that man's soul is lightened with the brightness of God's light, so that it is never altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparele of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehended not God. And why? because man's quickeness of witte, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darkness. For when the holy Ghost calleth men darkness, he at once spoileth them of all abilitie of spiritual understanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithful which embrace Christ, are borne not of blood, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say; flesh is not capable of so high wifedome to conceive God and that which is God's, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a special revelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

20 If we were persuaded of this which ought to be out of all controversy, that our nature wanteth at that, which our heavenly father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt upon. For thus speaketh the faithful people in the prophet: For with thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when he faith, that no man can call Jesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And John Baptitist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, than no man can receive any thing, vnlesse it be given him from above. And that he meaneth by giueth a special illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, that he complaineth in so many words as he had spoken to commend Christ to his disciples, he prevaileth nothing. I see (faith he) that words are nothing to informe mens minde concerning divine things, vnlesse the Lord giue understandings by his spirit. Yea, and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgers fulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes growe wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefite of God. Thine eyes (fayeth he) have seen... those great tokens and wonders, &c. The Lord hath not given thee a heart to understand, nor ears to hear, nor eyes to see. What should be express more, if he called vs blockes in considering the workes of God? Whereupon the Lorde by the Prophet promises for a great grace, that hee will give the Israelites a heart, that they may knowe him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spirittually wise, as it is lightened by him. And this Christ plainly confirmed with his owne mouth, when he sayeth, that no man can come to him, but he to whom it shalbe given from the Father. What is not he himselfe the liuely image of the Father in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed vnto vs? Therefore he could not better shew what our power is to knowe God, then when he sayeth, that we have no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers John 6.44. will vnto men? And did he not faithfully do his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inward scholemaster, the holy Ghost, set open the way to our mindes. Therefore none come to him, but they that have heard and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Even, when the holy Ghost by marvellous and singular vertue forseth the cares to heare, and the mindes to understand. And least that should seeme strange, he allegeth the prophe-sie of Esay, where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shalbe gathered together to saluation, shal be taught of the Lorde. If God there foreheweth some peculiar thing concerning his electes, it is evident that he speakeoth not of that kinde of learning that was also common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that wee must understand it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy ghost by his enlightening shall make a new mind. But Paul speakeoth most plainly of all, which of purpose entring into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisdome of folly and vanitie, and vterly brought it to nought, at the last concludes thus: that the natural man cannot perceive those things that are of the spirite of God: they are foolishnesse vnto him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spirittually judged. Whome dooth hee call naturally? even him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. Hee I say comprehendseth nothing in the spirittual mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by slothfulness he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would trauel never so much, he can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spirittually judged. What meaneth that? because being vterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely revelation of the spirite: so that they are reckned for folly where the spirite of God giueth not light. Before he had advanced those things that God hath prepared for them that love him, aboute the capacittie of eyes, cares and mindes. Yea, he testifieth that mans wisdome was as a certaine veile, whereby mens minde was kept from seeing God. What meanewee? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdome of this world is made folly by God: and shal we forsooth giue vnto it sharpeesse of understanding, whereby it may perece to the secrete places of the heavenly kingdome? Farre be such beaselines from vs.
And so that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he giveth it to God alone. God (faith he) & the father of glory, giveth to you the spirit of wisdom & revelation. Now thou hearest that all wisdom and revelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your mind. Surely if they neede a new revelation, then are they blind of themselves. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling. &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the witnes of men are not capable of so great understanding, to knowe their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedie that dullenesse or unskilfulness, when by the doctrine of his words he directeth mans understanding, whither without a guide he could not have attayned. For Daniel had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisdom that may bee desired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to have his eyes opened, that he may consider the mysteries of the same lawe. By which speech truly he secretly faith, that the sunne riseth upon the earth where the worde of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, until he himselfe, that is therefore called the father of lightes, doe give them or open their eyes, because whereouer he shineth not with his spirit, all things are poffefed with darkenesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best scholasther: yet if they had not needed the spirit of truth to instruct their minds in that same doctrine which they had heard before, hee would not have bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we ask of God, wee doe thereby confess that we want: & God in that that he promiseth it vs,doeth argue our neede,let no man doubt to confess that he is so much able to understand the mysteries of God as he is enlightened with his grace. He that giveth to himselfe more understanding, is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindnesse.

Nowe remayneth the thirde pointe, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which wee doe rightly call the knowledge of the works of righteousness, wherein mans wit seemeth to bee of somewhat more sharpe light, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the gentiles which have no lawe, while they doe the worke of the lawe, are to themselves in stead of a lawe, and do shewe the law written in their harts, their confidences bearing them wittnes, and their thoughts accusing them within themselves or excusing them before the judgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteousness naturally grauen in their minds, surely we can not say that wee are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more cōmon, than that man by the law naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the lawe is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, howe farte it bringeth them towarde the marke of reason and truth. The same is also evident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. Hee had sayde a little before, that they which sinned in the lawe, are judged by the lawe, they that have sinned without lawe doe perish without lawe. Because this might feeme unreasonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any judgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in stead of a law, and there-therefore is sufficient for their just damnation. Therefore the end of the law natural is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shall be defined not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently discerneth betwixt just and unjust, to take away from men the pretense of ignorance, while they are proued guilty by their owne testimonie. Such is the tenderness of man towards himselfe, that in doing of evils, hee alway turneth away his minde so much as he may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was moved to thinke that there is no sin done but by ignorance. That in deede were full fayde of him, if mens hypocrisy went to farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not knowe it selfe guilty before God. But when the sinner seeking to elude the judgement emprinted in him, is nowe and then drawn backe vnto it, & not sufferd to wilde, but that he be compelled whether he wil or no, sometime to open his eyes; it is falsely faide that he sinneeth onely by ignorance.

23 Themisius faith more truly, which teacheth that understanding is seldom deceived in the general defining of thinges, that it is blindnesse when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the speciall case. Every man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manslaughter is euill: but he that conspireth to kill his enemies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemn adulterie, but in his owne, privately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignorance, when a man coming to the speciall case forgettetth the rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the general question. Of which thing Augustine difcurseth very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the lV. Psalme: albeit the same thing is not continuall. For sometime the shamefulnes of the euill deede doth prefteth the conscience, that not deceiuing himselfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly & willingly he runneth into euill. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better and allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me thinke, Aristotle hath very aptly made distinction betweene Incontinence & intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he faith, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euill in his owne aet, which it generally seeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repenance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguisched or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceited choice of euill.

24 Now when thou hearest judgement universally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not every founde and perfect judgement. For if mens heartes are furnished with choice of just and vniust, only to this end, that they should not pretend ignorance, it is not then needfull to see the truth in every thing. But it is enough & more, that they vnderstand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being convict by wittnesse of their conscience, they even now alreadie begin to tremble at the judgement seat of God. And if we will trie our reason by the law of God, which is the exemplar of true righteousnesse, we shall find how many ways it is blinde. Truly it attainteth not at all to those that are the chiefest thinges in the First table, as of confidence in God, of giving to him the praise of strength and righteousnesse.
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of tenuousness, of calling upon his name, of the true keeping of Sabbat. What soyle ever by natural sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these & like things? For when profane men wil worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine tribles, yet they alway slide backe thither againe. They deny in decree that sacrifices do please God, vnslesse there be adioyned a purenesse of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceive somewhat of the spiritual worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false inuention.
For it can never be persuadcd them, that all is true that the lawe prefi-beth of it. Shal I say, that that wit excelleth in any sharpe understanding, which can neither of it vse be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the com-mandements of the Second table it hath some more understanding, by so much as they came nearer to the preceruation of civil fellowship among men. Albeit euin herein also it is found manie times to faile. To every excellent nature it seemeth most unreasonable, to suffer an vnjust, & too imperious a manner of governing ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the judgemen of mans reafon is none other, but that it is the part of a servile & base courage, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the parte of an honest & free borne heart, to make it off. And reuenge of injuries is reck-ced for no fault among the Philosophers. But the Lorde condemning that too much nobleness of courage, commandeth his to keepe the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our understanding marketh not concupiscence at all. For a natural man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseascs of his desires. The light of nature is choked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this botomless depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of minde for faults, they meane those motions that appeare and sweepe forth themselves by groffe tokens, but they make no account of those evil desires that do gently tickle the minde.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all sinnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be rejected, which teach that purposed malice and frowardnesse is vse in all sinnes. For wee finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is overwhelmed with so many fortes of being deceived, is subiect to so many errors, stumbleth at so many styes, is entangled with so many straites, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lorde in all partes of our life, Paul sheweth when he sayeth, that we are not sufficient to think any thing of our selues, as of our selues. Hee speakeneth not of wil or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that we should not thinke that i: can come in our mindes how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, understanding and heed so corrupted, that it can deuise or thinke upon nothing that is right before the Lord; that seemeth too hard to vs, that doth unwillingly suffer our selues to be spoyled of the sharpnesse of reafon, which we account a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equitie, which sheweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine; and which pronounceth plainly, that at the inuention of mans heart is onely evil. If all that our witte conceiueth deu-

Psalm 94:11.
feth upon, purpofeth & goeth about, is alwaies euill, howe it come in our mindes to purpofe that which pleareth God, to whom one lyely holmesfe and righteousnes is acceptable? So is it to be scene, that the reafon of our mind, which way foever it turne it selfe, is miserably subiect to vanitie, David knew this weakenesse in himselfe, when he prayed to have understanding giuen him, to learn the Lords commandements aright. For he secretly layeth therein, that his owne wit sufficeth him not, which defirzeth to have a newe giuen him, And that not onely once, but almost tenne times, in one Psalm, he repeath his fame prayer. By which repeath he priuily declarzeth, with how great neede he is drun to pray it. And that which he prayeth for him selfe alone, Paul commonly vseth to pray for the Churches. We ceafe ne (fom he) to pray for you, and to desire that ye may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisedome and spirittuall understanding, that ye may walke worthyly of God & c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that hee doeth withall testifie, that it lyeth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledgeth this default of reafon to understand those thinges that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eyes. And not content with that, he addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lift vp our eyes to see the light: but the eyes of our minde lye shut, vnlesse the Lorde open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterwaids see by themefelues: for that which I euen now alleged out of Paul, belongeth to continual proceedings & encreasings, And this dooth David expressly set out in these words: With my whole heart have I sought thee, make me not to stray from thy commandements. For when he had beene regenerated, & had not slenderly proficted in true godlinesse, yet hee confesseth, that for every moment he needeth continuall direction, lest he should swarve from the knowledge werewith he is endued. Therefore, in an other place hee prayeth to have the right spirite renewed, which he had lost by his own fault, because it belongeth to the same God to restore vnto vs the fame thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

26 Nowe is will to be examined, wherein standeth the chiefe libertie of free chofe, for it hath bin alreadie feene, that chofe doth rather belong to wil, than to vnderstanding. First, this thing which the Philosophers haue taught, & is receiued with common consent, that is, all things by natural inflation desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to vpright-nesse of mans wil: Let vs mark that the force of free wil, is not to be condered in such appetit, as rather procedeth of inclination of the essence, than of the adulement of the vnderstanding minde. For euen the school-men do confess, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selfe to objectts, whereby they meane that the object of appetit must be such as may be subject to chofe, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for chofe. And truely, if a man consider what is the naturall desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beasts. For they alfo desire to be wel, and when any thewe of good appeareth that mo-neth their sense, they follow it. But man doth neither chofe by reason, he may

may follow with diligence that thing which is in deed good for him, according to the excellency of his immortal nature, nor taketh reason to counsel, nor bendeth his mind, but without reason, without counsel, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, a man by sense of nature be caried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discerns good by right reason, and when he hath known it, that he chose it, and when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But if any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophistical argument. For appetite is not here called the proper manner of will, but a natural inclination: and good is called not as of virtue or justice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do never so much desire to attain that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternall blessedness is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspieth vnto it, but by the mouing of the holy Ghost. Wherefore, with the natural desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to prove the freedome of will, no more than in metals and stones, dote the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let us consider in other things, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euil; or whether it keepeth still any parcel vnhatte, though whence do growe good desires.

27 They that do attribute to the first grace of God, that we will effectually, seeme on the other side to say secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selues to aspire to good, but it is so weak, that it cannot growe to a perfect affection, or raise vp any endeavoure. And there is no doubt that the scholmen haue commonly embrased this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the olde writers: soasmuch as they are wont to consider man in pure natural things, (as they terme it) such as the Apostle describeth him in these words: I do not the good I would, but the euill that I would not, that I doe. To will is present vnto me, but to performe it, I find not. But after this maner is the discourse Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully perverted. For he entreateth of the Christian wrestling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galatians) which the faithful continually feele within them selves, in the bartell of the flesh & the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this; y when he had said, that there dwelleth no goodnes in him, he addeth an exposition, that he meaneth it of his flesh: And therefore he saith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in mee, that is, in my flesh? Even as much as if he had said thus: God dwelleth not in me of my self, for there is no good to be found in my flesh. Hereupon followeth that manner of excuse: I myselfe do not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which do with the chiefe part of their soule tende vnto good. Now, the conclusion that is adjoyned after, declareth all this matter evidently. I am delited (faith he) with the lawe, according to the inward man: But I see an other lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a striving in himself; but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God, carieth carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, where as once he had thought, that that had beene spoken of the nature of man, ca. 10. Et in Re-reueoked his exposition as false, and ill agreeing together. And true, if wee allow this, that men without grace haue some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we anfwere to the Apostle which fayth, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What Shall we anfwere to the Lorde that pronounced by Moses, that euerie inuention of mans heart is onely cuill? Wherefore, if they haue stumblhed by false taking of one place, there is no cause why wee should e staye upon their judgement.

It is not sufficient to confesse that grace maketh the desires of our vitaffectual, which otherwise would not be able to attain any good thing which is vnwished for: but wee must acknowledge that it is the grace of the holy ghost, which vvorkeeth in us the very first beginning to shynge of vnishing well.

Let rather this saying of Christ preuail. Hee that doeth sinne is the seruant of sinne. Wee are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all holden under the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole man bee subject to the dominion of sinne, then must it needs be, that the will it selfe which is the chief estate thereof, be bound fast with most straite bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paul would not stande together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did goe before the grace of the Holy Ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triually spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull do pray to haue their heart formed to the obedience of the lawe, as David doth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that euery that desire of praying is from God. Which wee may gather of his wordes, for when he wistheth to haue a cleane heart created within him, surely he taketh not on himselfe the beginning of creation. Therefore, let rather this saying of Augustine haue place with vs: God will prevent thee in all things: And sometime prevent thou his wrath. Howe? Consciente Deverbis Apost. that thou haft all these things of God, that whatsoever good thou haft, is of him; whatsoever cuill, it is of thy selfe. And a little after: Nothing is ours but sinne.

That out of the corrup nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.

But man cannot but any way better known in either parte of his soule, than if he come forth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If hee be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to proove, then is hee proued to bee a verie miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimite against God, and so is not subject, nor can bee subject to the lawe of God. Is flesh so perilous, that with all her affection shee continually veth enimite against God? that she cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the law of God? Finally, that shee can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Nowe, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth only to the sensuall, and not the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle: It is the Lorde's argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. Hee commandeth not to be borne againe according to the body. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be.

The whole mind of man & not on ly the sensuall part is corrupted.

John.3.6.
it be amended but when it is all renewed. And that doeth the comparison, set in both places, confirmes. For the spirite is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betwene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spiritual in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we haue nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoever we haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we could haue any doubt, that is taken away vs by Paul, where after he had described the old man, whom he had faied to be corrupt with concupiscences of error, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the spirite of our mind: you see he doeth not place vnlawfull and evil lustes only in the flesh we part, but also in the very mind, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truly a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shewe that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruerct: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in understanding, stranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindnesse of their heart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the vertuethesse both of his wisedome and justice: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these words we gather, that the grace of Christ is the onely remedie whereby we be delivered from that blindnesse, and the evils that ensue thereof. For so had Esay also prophesied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, the Lord should be an everlasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse couered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leave nothing but darkenesse and blindnesse. I will not rehearse particularly such things as are written every where, specially in the Psalmes and in the Prophets against the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that Dauid wrieth, if he be eyed with vanitie, that he shall be vayne than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wound with a greuous weapon, when all the thoughts that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifling, madde and peruerse.

2. No easer is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse above all things: but because I studie to be short, I wil be content with one place alone, but such a one as shalbe like a most bright looking glasse, wherein wee may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throw downe the arrogancie of mankind, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that understandeth or that seeketh God, Al are gone out of the way, they are made unprofitable together, there is none that doeth good, no not one: their throtes is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they work deceithfully, the poison of Serpents is vnder their lippes, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: whose feete are swift to shedde bloude, in whose wayes is forrowe and vnhappinesse, which hate not the seare of God before their eyes. With these thunderboltes hee inueth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sons of Adam. Neither declaimeth hee against the corrupt manners of one or two ages, ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simly to chide men, to make them amende, but to teach rather that all men are oppresse with calamitie, impossible to be overcome, from which they cannot get vp againe, vnlesse they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And becausethat could not be proued vnlesse it had beene by the ouerthrowe and destruction of nature, hee brought forthe these testimonies whereby is proued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they bee here described, not only by fault of euill custome, but also by corruptncesse of nature. For otherwithe the Apostles argument cannot stande, that there is no salvation for man but by the mercie of God, because hee is in himselue utterly lost and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in prouing the applying of these testimonies that no man should thinke them vnfitly vseth. I will so take them as if they had beene first spoken by Paul, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man righteousnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then understanding. The want of understanding, he prooueth by Apostasie or departing from God, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisedome. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God, Hee layeth further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doeth good, and then he adiouneth the haynous faults, wherewith they defile their members that are once let loose into wickednesse. Last of all he testiteth that they are void of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should haue bin directed. If these be the inheritable gifts of mankinde, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. In deed I grant that not all these faults do appeare in every man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the hearts of al men. For as the body while it alreadie fostreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot be called healthie: no more can the soule be reckened found, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all points. For in the bodie be it never so much diseased, there remaineth a quickenesse of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulf of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath bin before assuyled, nowe riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there haue bin some, which by guiding of nature haue bin bent to vertue in al their life. And I regard it not, though many flippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the verie stu-die of honestie they haue shewed a proofe, that there was some purenesse in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although wee will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merites of works, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that wee should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her instruction some men haue not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaved themselues most honestly. But here wee must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there

The morall honestie of prophane men, no argument of puritie in nature; because it commeth not of themen but of the grace of God, nor king in them: not the grace that regeneraseth the heart, but that bringeth onely & restrauneth the pernernesse of naturall inclination.

there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restraine it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with loose reins to runne wildly into all sortes of lustes, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleev, that all those evils whereby Paul condemneth all nature, are most truely layd of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose fece are swift to shed bloud, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their tongues like vnto open Sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lippes venomous, their worke vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruersenesse, whose eyes are bent to entrapings, their hartes lyfe vp dispitously to triumph over other, and all the partes of them applied to infinite mischeues If euctrie soule be subiect to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldly pronounceoth, truely we see what would come to passe, if the Lorde would suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beast that is so hedlong caried away, there is no flame be it never so swift and strong, whereof the overflowing is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that wee will by and by set forth. In some he onely restraineoth the with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, to farre as he foreleeth to be expedient for preferring of the vnierustie of things. Hereby some are holde in by flame, some by feare of lawes, hat they build not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vnierustie. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sorte aspire toward it. Some rise vp above the common sort, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their duttie. So God by his prudence bridleth the peruersenesse of nature, that it breake not forth into doing: but he cleanseth it not within.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolued. For either wee must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or else in Camillus wee shall have an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I grant in deedlee that those goodly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme worthie to be commended, if they be wedy by themselves, but howe shall they be proues of naturall goodnesse in him? must wee not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sorte? If a naturall man excelled in such uprightness of manners, then nature is undoubtedly not without power towards the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruersie and crooked, and following any thing rather than uprightness? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you grant that he was a naturall man. Nowe what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto mee in this behalfe, if in the greatest thewe of purenesse it be founde that he is alwaye carried to corruption? Therefore, least ye commend a man for vertue, whose vices deceu you vnder vertues Image, do not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne peruersnesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common giistes of nature, but special graces of God, which he diuerstie & to a certaine a certaine measure dealeth amongst men that are otherwise vngodlie. For which reason wee fear not in common speach to call one man well natur ved, and an other of euill nature, and yet wee cease not to include them both vnder the vniuerfall state of mans corruption, but wee shewe what sp ol grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which hee hath not vouch ed to gecue to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him as a newe man. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, saith that Kings sonses are created notable by some singular marke, because God proiding for mankind, furniseth these with a princely nature whome he appointeth to beare gourment: & out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renowned in histo ries. The same is also to be thought of private men. But because as every man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moved him forward e with which spot all vertues are defiled, so that they lofe all favour before God;) it is to be accorded nothing worth, whatsoever seemeth praiswor thie in vngodly men, beside that the chief part of vprightnes failth, where there is no studie to advaunce the glorie of God, which al they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vainly spoken in Esay. that vpon Christ resteth the spirite of the seate of God, whereby wee are taught, that many as are strange from Christ are without feare of God, which is the beginning of wisdom. As for the vertues that deceiu vs with vaine shewe, I grant they shall haue praisw in the court of policie, and in the common fame of men, but before the heavenly judgement seate, they shall be of no value to deserve righteounes.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is detained, it cannot once move it selfe to goodnesse, much leaue apply it selfe. For such moving is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremie prays to the Lord to turne him, if he will haue him turned. Whereupon the Prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spiritual redemption of the faithful people, saith that they were redeee med out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with howe straite letters a sin ger is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Diuel. Yet Will stil remaineth, which with most bent affection is both encluded and haileth to sinne. For man was not deprifed of Will when he did call himselfe into this necessitie, but of the soundnes of Will.
And Bernard faith not vnaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simpily to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill, of corrupt nature: to Will well, of grace. Now whereas I say, that will put from libertie is by necessitie drawne or led into euill, it is manuer if that should seeme a hard speach vnto any ma, which neither hath any absurditie in it, nor varieth from vs of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betwene necessitie & compulsion, But if a man ask them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the diuel of necessitie euill? what can they aunswer? For so is goodnesse knit with Gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessitie that he be God than that he be good. And the diuel is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnesse, that he can do nothing but euill, But nowe if any robber of God do
Cap. 3. Of the knowledge of

Do barke against this and say, that God deserveth small praise for his goodness, which he is compelled to keep: shall not this be a ready answer to him, that it cometh to passe by his infinite goodness and not by violent impulsion, that he cannot do evil. Therefore if this, that it is of necessity that God doth well, doth not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the diuell which cannot do but evil yet willingly sineth, who shall then say that a man doeth therefore falsely willingly sinne for this that hee is subject to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine eche where speaketh of it, even then also when he was entouchly pressed with the caulation of Celestinus, he stucketh not to affirm in these words, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but nowe the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as hee falleth into mention thereof, hee doubteth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kepte, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth in deede willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by forraine constraint: but ye of such peruerse nature as hee is, hee cannot but be moved and druen to euill. If this be true, then surely it is plainly expressed that he is subject to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine writeth thus, onely man among all living creatures is free: and yet by means of sinne, he also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that euery thereby also he shoulde not be deprived of freedom, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will being changed in it selke into worse, by I wot not what corrupt and maruellous manner, so maketh necessitie that verie necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, and will forasmuch as it is drawne by allurement, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine maner willing. Afterward he saith that we are pressed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will we are inexcusabile, because wil when it was free, made it selke the bond-servant of sinne. At length he concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine marvellous and euill maner holden both a bond-servant and free, under this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bond-servant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more marvellous and more miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the readers doe perceiue that I bring no newe thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the content of all godly men, & almost a thousand yeres after was kept stille in monkes Cloyfeters. But Lombard when he could not distinguinsh necessitie from compulsion, saue matter to a pernicious errour.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what manner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended & healed, For whereas the Lorde in helping vs, giueth vs that which wee want, when wee shall knowe what his worke is in vs, it will streight way appeare, on the other side what is our neediness. When the Apostle sayth to the Phi-Philippians, that he trusteth that he which began a good work in them, will performe it vnto the day of Iesus Christ: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, he meaneth the veric beginning of conversion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stiring vp in our hearts the love, desire and endevore of righteounesse, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our hearts to righteounesse: hee endeth it in confirming vs to perforeuance. And that no man should caunill that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of it selfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghost in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it selfe. I will give you (saith hee) a newe heart. I will put a newe spirit in the middes of you. And I will take away the stonic heart from your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirite in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commandements. Who shall say that the weaknesse of mans will is strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aspire to the choise of that that is good, when it must be whole transformed and renued? If there be any softnesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to bee bowed euerie way, then will I gaignt that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, bee supplied by the grace of God. But if hee meant to shewe by this similitude, that no goodnesse could ever be wrong out of our heart vnlesse it be made throughly newe: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which hee challengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into flesh, when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I say that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the conversion of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an euill wil into a good. And this I affirme to bee wholly done by God, because wee are not able so much as to thinke, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in another place hee saith, that God doth not onely helpe our weake will, or amende our peruerse will, but that hee worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is easely gathered, that which I said before, that whatsoever good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace, in which sense in another place he saith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there intreat of the vnuerfall gounernement, but giueth vnto God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in saying, all, truely hee maketh God the author of spiritual life, even from the beginning to the ende. Which selfe same thing he had taught before in other words, saying that the faithfull are of God in Chrift, where he plainly make mention of the newe creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is destroyed. For there is to be understood a comparison betwenee Adam and Chrift, which in another place hee more plainly expresseth, where hee teacheth that wee are the worke of God created in Chrift to good works, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to prove, that our saluation is of free giftes, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the seconde creation, which which we obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our felues, were it neuer fo small, wee should haue alfo some portion of merite. But hee to prooue vs alogether nothing worth, reafoneth that wee haue deferted nothing, because we are create in Christ to good works, which God hath prepared. In which words he signifieth agaie, that all partes of good works, euen from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had said in the Pflame that wee are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, Were made not our felues. That he speake heere of regeneration, which is the beginning of spiritual life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now how he not contented simply to haue giuen to God the praiue of our saluation, doth expressly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if he would say, that there resteth no piece, be it neuer fo little, for man to glory in, because it is all of God.

It is not enough to make God the principal author & leader of our good actions, but the whole process must be ascribed intirely unto him.
Ad Bonif. Epi. 106.

Scri. de inuent. S. Crucis.

7 But there be some peraduenture that will grante, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is converted by the onely power of the Lord: but soo that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before every good worke, but soo, that will doth accompany it and not leade it, as a wayting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euil spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doeth disdainerly wriate to this purpose. But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signified, that the Lord doeth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of his selfe putte in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is prevented by grace, in that respect I giue you leave to call it a wayting maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lorde, this is wrongfully giuen to man that he doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke verie well it selfe, as cuen nowe wee haue seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the wayting maide of grace, to alligne vnto her a certaine second office in doing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principal caufe of saluation in mans deserying: therefore hee doode onely vpon this point, that grace was before all deserying: which was sufficient for the matter that hee then had in hande, nor medling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handleth. For sometymes when hee faith, that the Lord dooth preuente the willing that hee may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, hee maketh him altogether the whole author of the good worke. Albeit his sentence touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguine vpon them. Men (faith hee) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius & Celestius, where he doeth expound that saying of Christ, Every one that hath hath heard of my father commeth to me, he faith: Free will is so holpen not onely that it may knowe what is to be done, but also may doe it when it hath knowne it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by the grace of the spirite, hee so teacheth, that hee that hath learned, doth not onely see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

8 And because wee are nowe in hande with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs go forward and prove the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a fewe and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, lastly any man shoulde accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the scripture, let vs shewe that the truth which wee affirme being taken out of the Scripture, waneth not the testimonie of this holy man, I mean A. Augustine.

For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shall be brought forth, the way may be prepared to understand all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shall not be vnfruitfully done, if I openly shewe that I agree well with that man whome worthlie the confess of godly men dooth much esteeme. Surely, it is evident by plaine and certaine proofe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there can not be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also an other reason not unlike unto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be seene whence faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when wee, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lorde, when he nameth these two things in the conversion of his people, to take away from them a stonic heart, and to give them a heart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must be done away, that wee may be converted to righteousness, and that whatsoeuer commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he verrereth not this in one place only. For he faith in Jeremie: I will give them one heart and one way, that they may seare mee all their dayes. And a little after, I will give the seare of my name into their heart, that they depart not from mee. Again in Ezechiel: I will give them one heart, & I will gie a new spirite in their bowels. I will take away the stonic heart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh. Hee could not more euyently claime to himselfe, & take from us whatsoeuer is good and right in our will, then when he declareth that our conversion is a creation of a new spirit, and of a newe heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

9 And so read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde encline our heart to him ( faith Salomon ) that wee may keepe his commandements. He sheweth the stowardnesse of our heart which naturally is of him.

Ps. 119.

Materially rejoiceth to rebell against the Lawe of God if it be not bowed. And the same thing is in the Psalmes: Lorde incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betwenee the pervertse motion of the heart, whereby it is caried to obtinacie, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When David seeling himselfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a newe heart within him, to reuene a right spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the partes of his heart are full of uncleannesse, and his spirit writheen with crooked peruerstie; and in calling the cleanness with which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doeth hee not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the vere prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our aunswere is readie, that though David were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doeth he stil compare his first state with that sorrowfull fall that hee had felte. Therefore taking vpon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause prayeth to have given him all these things: God giueth to his elect in regeneration. So being like a dead man, hee witheth himselfe to bee created of newe, that of the bondslave of Satan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Marvellous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride, God requirethe nothing more earnestly, than that wee should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If sluggishness hindreth not, Christ hath giuen testimonie evident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuously suppressed. I am (faith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruite of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in me. For without me you can doe nothing. If wee beare fruite none otherwise, than a branch budding being plucked out of the grounde and without moisture: wee neede no more to seeke what is the aptness of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can do nothing. He doeth not say that wee are too weake to be sufficient for our selues: but in bringing vs to nothing, hee excluded all opinion of power be it never so little. If wee being grafted in Christ, beare fruite like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of influences both from the moisture of the earth, and from the dewe of heaven, and from the cherishing of the sunne: I see nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if wee keepe whole for God that which is his. The fonde stulle duell is alledged in vaine, that there is iuyce alreadie enclosed within the branche, and a certaine power to bring forth fruite, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first roote, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christ doeth meane nothing els, but that wee are a drie sticke and nothing worth, when we be seuered from him, because by our selues being separate, we have no power to do well: as also in another place hee faith: Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted shall be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole unto him in the place alreadie alledged. It is God (faith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe. The
The first part of a good work is will: the second is a strong endeavour in doing it: the author of both is God. Therefore we steal it from God, if we take to our selves any thing, either in will or in effectual working. If it were faide that God doth help our weak will, then somewhat were left for us. But when it is faide that he maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it cannot rise vp: He said further, that to overcome the hardnesse of that bartell, there is ministr’d vnto vs strength of endeav’r, even to the effect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that doth in all things in all, wherein we have before taught that the whole course of spiritual life is comprehended. For which reason, David, after he had prayed to have the ways of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walk in his truth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my heart to feare thy name. In which wordes he signifieth, that even they that are well minded, are subject to so many withdrawings of mind, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stabiliz’d to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had prayed to have his steedes directed to keep the wordes of God, he requireth also to have strength giuen him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (faith he) beare rule over me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin & end a good work in vs: that it may all be his worke, that will conceal the loue of that which is right, that it is inclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp & moved to endeav’r of following it. And then that our choice, desire, and endeav’r faile not, but do proceede cuen to the effect; last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

10 And he moweth the will, not in such sort as hath in many ages beene taught & beleu’d: that it is afterward in our choice, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strenthening it. Therefore that must be receiued which Christ saith so oft repeateh: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth only reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his aid. Wee grant that such was the state of man while he yet stood, that he might bow to either part. But that he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, vndescribably God both will and can in vs: what shall become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather we do obfuscate and extenuate it with our vnthankfulnes. For the Apostle doeth not teach, that grace of a good will is offered vs, if we do accept it, but y he wil performe it in vs: which is nothing els, but that the Lord by his spirit doth direct, bowe and governe our heart, & reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezekiel, that he will giue to the elect a newe spirite onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commaundements, but to make them walke in deede. Neither can Christs saying, (Evvery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise take, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuall of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchesafeth not to giue to all men generally without regarde, as that saying (as I think) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doeth what lieth in him. Men are in deede

to be taught that God's goodnesse is laide open for all men, without exception that secke for it. But forasmuch as they onely beginne to secke for it, whome the heavenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as the little pece ought to be plucked away from his praine. Truly this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirtie of God, they are moued and governed by his guiding. Therefore Auguftine doeth worthily as well mocke them, that claime any parte of willing to themselues, as hee doeth reprehende other which thinke, that that is generally given to all men, which is the speciall testimonie of free election. Nature (faithe) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a briche subtiltie of witte like glasse, that glistereth with neere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whome it please theb him. And in another place: Howe camest thou by beleuuing. Feare thou, leeft while thou takest upon thee that thou haft found the iuft way, thou perish out of the iuft way, I came (faieft thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Heare even him that calleth: No man commeth to mee vnlese my Father drawe him. And it is without controversie gathered out of John words, that the heartes of the godly are so effectuallie governed by God's working, that they folowe with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (faithe he) can not sinne, because the seede of God abideth in him. For wee see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which we at our liberrie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuall constancie to continue is affirmed.

11 Of continuance there should no more doubt haue beene made, but that it should haue beene taken for the free gift of God vnlese the moste wicked errour had grownen in force, that it is distributed according to the desert of men, as euete man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankfull to the first grace. But forasmuch as this errour hath grownen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receive the grace of God offered, that opinion being driven away, this other doeth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they erre two manner of wayes. For beside this that they teache that our thankfulnesse towarde the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof are rewarded with the latter gifts; they add also, that newe grace alone doeth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the first this wee ought to beleuue, that the Lorde while hee daily enricheth and heapeth his seruants with newe gifts of his grace, because hee liketh & fauourereth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to beftowe to beftowe greater graces. And hereto serve those sayings, To him that hath, shall be giuen. Againe: Oh, good seruant, because thou hast beene faithfull in fewe things, I will set thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawfull vse of the first grace be laid to be rewarded with the latter graces, nor it beeso counted a rewarding, that it ceasse to be reckoned the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this blessing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they have vse of the first graces, they shall be encreased with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of my Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they vse no leffe wrongfully than unhappily that old destruction of working & together working grace. Augustine viled the same in deed, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth ende, that which in working he beginneth, & that it is still the same grace but changeth name, according to the divers maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it betweene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but onely the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in an other place he teacheth, that many gifts of God do goe before the good will of man, amonge the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leauneth nothing that it may claime to itself. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had said that it is God, which worketh in vs both to wil & to performe, he by & by addeth, he doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodness. Whereas they are wont to say, that after wee haue once given place to the first grace, our owne endeavours do now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I answere: If they meanee that we, after we haue beene once by the power of the Lorde broken to the obedience of righteousnesse, do of our owne accord go forward, & are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certaine, that there is such a readiness of obeying, where the grace of god reigneth. But whence commeth that, but from this, that the spirit of God alway agreeing with it self, doth cherish & confirm to steadfastnesse of continuing the same affection of obeying, which is selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meanee that man taketh of himselfe somewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pestilently deceived.

12 And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I have laboured more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so, that he calleth himselfe a worke together with grace. It is maruell, that so many which otherwise were not euil men, haue stumbled at this strawe. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away al the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (faith he) that have laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the dourfullnes of the speach deceived them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greek article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkly, though shortly, where he thus saith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: His mercy hath preuented me: And his mercy shall follow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him wil: & it followeth him willing, that he will not in vaine, With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking thus:

13 Now let vs heare Augusline speaking in his owne words, leaft the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, shoulde as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whom long ago Augusline was drawen forth in to the same contention. In his booke of Correction and Grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will reheare shortly, but yet do it in his owne wordes: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he woulde: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to overcome con- cipiscence: that hee therefore had to be able if he woulde, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And leaft he should be thought to speak of the pensefion to come after immortalitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a little after he plucketh out this dout. For (faith he) the wil of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore wil, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weakenesse, in which yet behoue the power to bee made perfect, for repressing of pride, their own wil were left vnto them, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doeth not worke in them to wil: then among so many temptations wil should needs fall downe for weakenesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weakenesse of mans will, that it should be moued without swaruing or feuering by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint howe weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our heartes do of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he faith, that the Lord doth drawe men in deede with their owne willes, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testified by Augusline's mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not only offered by God to be receiued or resuued at every mans Free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election & wil in the heart: so that every good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his wordes out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh every good worke in vs.

14 But whereas he faith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euil will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meaneth onely that man is not so drawen, that without any motion of heart he is caried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his verie heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: We knowe that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whom it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merites of worke, nor according to the merits of wil, but of free favour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the iust judgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen to the deseruings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselves worthy. For he will haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessary to vs for euer of our doings, and is not giuen in remembrance to workes, that it may be grace in deede. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correction and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtained grace not by libertie, but libertie by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delights printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with invincible force: that while grace governeth, it never falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbleth downe. That by the free mercie of God it both is converted to good, and being converted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and steadfastnesse after direction, hangeth vpon the only will of God, and not vpon any merit of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we lift so to call it, as he wrieth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

It is sufficiently proued, as I thinke, that man is so holden captiue with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature hee can neither aspire by desire, nor travaile by endeuer to goodnesse: beside that, wee haue heard a distincion betweene compulsion and necessitie, whereby it might appeare, that when hee sinneth of necessitie, yet nevertheless hee sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subject in bondage to the Diuel, he seemeth rather to be ledde by the diuels will than his owne, it resteth nowe to be declared of what sort are both kindes of working. And then is this question to be assoyled, whether in euill workes there be any thing to be ascribed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsd some working of his. In one place Augustine comparseth mans will to a horse, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the diuell he comparseth to riders. If God (sayth he) sette vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, governeth it temperatly, spurreth it forward if it be too slowe, plucketh it backe if it be too quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse & wilfulness of it, tameth the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Diuel haue possessed it, hee like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carrieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steepe places, spurreth it forward to stubbornnesse and fearconesse: which finnitude wee will for this time be contented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is sayd that the will of natural man is subject to the rule of the diuel, to be stirred by him, it is not ment thereby that man as it were struing against it, and resisting is compelled to obey, as wee compell bondslaves against their will, by reason of being their lorde, to doe our commandements: but that being bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of necessitie yeldeth itselfe obedient to every leading of him. For whom the Lorde vouchsaith not to rule with his spirites.
Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of God, and the works of Satan.

2. Cor. 4:4.

God & Satan man working one & the self-same act, work diversly in respect as well of the end as the manner of doing. Job 1.

2. But farre other is the order of Gods doing in such things: and that the same may appeare more certainly vnto vs: let the hurt done to the holy man Job by the Chaldees be an example. The Chaldees killed his heardmen, & like enemies in warre, drove away his cattell for booties. Nowe is their wicked deed plainly scene, and in that worke Satan is not idle, for whome the Historie faith, that all this did proccede. But Job him selfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, whom he faith to have taken away from him those things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can wee referre the self-same worke to God, as author, to Satan as author, & to man as author of it, but y we must either excuse Satan by the company of Gods, or report Gods to be the author of evil? Very easily, if first we looke upon the end, why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamitie to exercize the patience of his seruants: The duell goeth about to drive him to dispaire. The Chaldees against right & lawe, seekke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diuerstie in purposrs, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the manner of doing there is no leffe diuerstie. The Lord leaueth his seruant to Satan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to execute it, he did leaue & deliuer to him to be druen to it. Satan with his venemous flings, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of themselves to do that mischief, they furiously runne to do wrong, & do binde & defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly saith, that Satan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdom, that is to say, the kingdom of wickednesse. It is also saith that God worketh in them after his manner, because Satan him selfe, forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding & comandement, turneth himselfe hither & thither to execute his just judgementes. I speake not here of Gods vniversal mouing, whereby as all creatures are sustaine, so from thence they take their effectual power of doing any thing. I speake only of that special doing, which appeareth in every special act. Wee see therefor that it is no absurditie, that one self act be ascribed to god, to Satan, & to man: but the diuerstie in the end & manner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the justice of God to be without fault, & also the wickednesse of Satan & man bewrayeth it selfe to their reproch.

3. The old writers in this point also, are sometime precisly afraid, simply to confesse the truth, because they feare lest they should so open a window to wickednesse, to speake irreuerently of the worke of God. Which sobrietie as I embrace, so I think it nothing daungersous, if wee simply hold what the the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himself sometime was not free from the superstition, as where he faith, that hardning and blinding, pertain not to the worke of God, but to his fore knowledge. But the phrares of Scripture allow not these futilitieas, which phrares do plainly shew that there is therin somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himself in his fift booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long proccede to prove that finnes are not only of the permiffion or fufferance of God, but also of his power, that fo former finnes might be punifhed. Likewise, that which they bring forth, concerning permiffion, is too weake to ftaande. It is ofte-ntimes faid, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that hee turneth, boweth, & moueth their hearts as I have eile where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is never expreffed, if wee fce to free foreknowledge or fufferance. Therefore we anfwer that it is done after two manneres. For fift, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darknes & blindnes: whereas when his spirit is taken away, our hearts wax hard & become ftones: whereas as when his direction cefteth, they are wrefted into crookednes, it is well faid that he doth blind, harden & bow them from whom he taketh away the power to fee, obey & do rightly.
The second manner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his judgemenets by Sathan the minifter of his wrath, he both appointeth their purpofes to what end it pleafeth him, and stirreth vp their willes, & ftrengtheneth their endeavours. So when Moses rehearseth that king Sehon did not giue paffage to the people, because God had hardened his spirit, & made his heart obftinate, he by and by adioyneth the end of his purpofe: that he might (for faith he) giue him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods wil to haue him destroyed, the making of his heart obftinate, was Gods preparation to his defftruction.

4. After the firt manner this femeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of trueth, & taketh away reaon from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are set over the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord, why haft thou made vs mad, and hardened our heart, that we should not feare thee? Because they judge rather of what fort God maketh men by forsaking them, than how he per-fometh his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that goe further: as are thefe of the hardening of Pharaos. I wil harden the heart of Pha-raos, that he do not heare you, & let the people go. Afterward he faith, that he hath made heauie & hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not fuffeining it? That is true in deede: but he did somewhat more, that he committed his heart to Sathan to be confirmed with obftinacy. Wherupon he had before faid: I wil hold his heart. The people went out of Egypt, the inhabitants of that countreie came forth & met them like enimies. By whom were they stirred vp? Truely Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lorde that had hardened their hearts. And the Prophet reciting the fame history, faith, that he turned their hearts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not fay, that they fumbled being left without the counfell of God. For if they be hardenned & turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that felfe thing. Moreoverfo oft as it pleged him to punife the transgressours of the people,
Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of people, how did he perform his work in the reprobate? For a man may see, that the effectualnes of working was in him, and they only did serve as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle; sometime that they should be like a net for him to entangle them, & sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Semachereb an Axe, which was both directed & driven by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not mise appoint it after this sort: that inasmuch as they sinne, it is their own: inasmuch as in sinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that decided the darkenesse as pleaseth him.

5 Now that the ministerie of Satan is vised as gods minister in the works of vnicendes.

1. Sam. 16.

10. & 29

3. Thes.

Not only in spiriual, but in the administration even of outward things, is it the speciall moving of God, that maketh his creatures anfwere us to our desires in doing us good, or turning evil away from us.

6 Although we have before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those doings, which are neither just nor faultie of them selues, and belong rather to the bodily than the spiriuall life. Some in such things have granted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not strive about a matter of no great importance, than by they minded certainly to prove the same thing that they grant. As for me, although I confesse that they which do holde that they have no power to righteounnesse, do hold the thing that is principally necessarie to salvation; yet I doe thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may knowe that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it commeth in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth thereunto: a-gaine, so oft as our wit & minde echaueth that which else would have hurt vs. And the force of Gods providence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shall foresee to be expedient, but also to make the willes of men to tend therunto. Truly, if we consider in our wit, the administration of outward things, we shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shall giue credit to so many testimo-testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in these things also rule the hearts of men, they shall compel vs to yelde our will subject to the speciall mouing of God. Who did procure the good willes of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lende them all their most precious jewells? They would never have found in their hearts to have so done of their own accord. Therefore their hearts were more subject to the Lord, than ruled by them selves. And truely if Jacob had not beene persuaad that God put into men divers affections as pleaseth him, he would not have saide of his sonne Joseph, whom he thought to be some Heathen Egyptian: God graunt you to finde mercie before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, that when it pleased God to have mercie vpon it, he meekned the hearts of the cruel nations. Againe, when Saul did waxe on fire with anger, that hee prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the Spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Abseloms minde, from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rahabean to be persuaad with the yong mens aduise? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the comming of Israel? Truely, the harlot Rahab confesseth, that it was done by God. Againe, who threwe downe the hearts of Israel with dread and fearefullnesse, but he that in the lawe threatened that he would giue them a fearefull heart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things uniuscally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooved that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his prouidence, even in outwarde things doeth bowe and turne the willes of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule over the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mouing of God, than vpon the freedome of thine owne choise; this daily experience shall compell thee to thynke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy judgement and wit oft faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage faileth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present aduise is oft offered thee in things great and perillous, thou haft a courage overcomming all difficultie. And so do I expound that which Salomon faith: That the care may heare, that the eye may see, the Lorde worketh both. For I take it that hee speakest not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whither he will the heart of the king as the streames of waters: truely under the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generallie. For if the will of any man be free from subjection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the willes of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hande of God, no more then our wil be exempted from the same estate. Upon this point there is a notable sayinge of Augustine: The Scripture if it bee diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not only the good willes of men which he of euill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doeth direct to good doings and to eternall life, but also these willes that preferre the creature of the worlde, are soin the power of God, that he maketh them to be inclined whither
whither he will and when he will, either to doe benefites, or to execute punishements, by a judgement most secret in deede, but the same most righteous.

Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans will is not to be wedy by the successe of things, which some unskillfull men are vnorderly wont to do. For they seeke to them selves to proue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because even the highest Monarches have not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof wee speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of free will, this is not to the question, whether man may for outwarde impediments, perfourme and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in mind, but whether he haue in every thing both a free election of judgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attlius Regulus, enclosed in the narrownesse of a tonne, set ful of sharpe pricke, shal leffe haue free will than Augustus Cæsar, governing a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

A consutation of the objections that are wvont to be brought for defence of Free will.

IT might seeme that we haue saide enough alreadie, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throwe it downe hedlong, did not on the contrarie parte pretendc certaine reasons to affaile our meaning. First they heap vp together diverse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from comon reason; afterward they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then ceaseth it to be sinne, if it be voluntarie, then may it be avoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to affaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satified them, concerning the matter it selfe. Ideny therefore that sinne ought the leffe to be impuited, because it is necessitie. I deny againe that this doeth followe which they conclude, that it may be avoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and secke to escape from his judgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise doe: God hath that aunswere ready which we in an other place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaves to sinne, can will nothing but eul. For whence commeth this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but vpon this, that Adam of his owne accord made himself subiect to the tyranny of the Diuell? Hereupon therefore grewe the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tyed, for that the first man fell from his creator. If all men be unjustly holden guilty of his falling away, let them not thinke themselves excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they haue a most evident cause of their damnation. And this I have aboue plainly set foorth, and I haue given an example in the Diuell himselfe, whereby it might appeare, that he which necessarly sinneth, doth neuer-neuertheless willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard alfo aptly teacht: that we are therefore the more miserable because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs to subiect vnto it, that we be the bondflaves of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntarie it straightway leapeth to free: but we haue before proued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subiect to free election.

They further say, that if both vertues and vices procede not of free choice of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment shoulde laye vpon man or rewardes giuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristophiles, yet I graunt it is in some places vsed by Chryfofomone and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hydeth not, and also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God work in vs; then it, not we that labour, halfe crowned. Of punishments I answere, that they are justly laid vpon vs from whom the guiltineses of sin procedeth. For what manner maketh it, whether sinne be done by free or bond judgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust specially sinfull man is hereby proued a sinner, for that he is under the bondage of sinnes. As to the rewards of righteousnesse: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifulnesse, than vpon our owne deseruings. Howe oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deseruings, but his owne gifts: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our deseruings, but such as are rendred to the graces alreadie bestowed vpon vs? Wisely in deede they note this, that nowe there remaineth no place for deseruings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we say so farre differing from trueth, they are much deceived. For Augustine doubreth not, commonly to teach for necessitie, that which they thinke so vnlawful to confesse, as where he faith: What be the merites of any men whatsoever they be; whethere he commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that made free from sinne: He findeth all men sinners. Againe, If that halfe be rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be punished: what is done then? God hath not giuen thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estranged from grace, boafe of thy deseruings.

Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selue, Sinnes are thine, but deseruings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when rewardeth cometh, he shall crown his owne giftes, and not thy deseruings. And in the same meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deseruings, but deseruing of grace. And a little after he concludes, that God with his gifts goeth before all deseruings, that out of the same hee may gather his owne deseruings, and doeth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to faute. But what needs is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often found in his writings? But the Apostle shal yet better deliver them from this error, if they heare from what beginning he conuicieth y glorie of the Saints: Whom he hath choosen, them he hath called, whom he hath called, them hee hath iustified: whom hee hath iustified, them hee hath.
hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? because by the Lords mercie and not by their owne endeavours they are both chosen and called and justified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shall no more be any deforning, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If Faith thou hast received all things, why gloriest thou, as if thou hadst not received them? Thou seest that for the same cause he taketh all things from free will, to leave no place for desoruing: but as the bountifulnesse and liberalitie of God is manifold, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which he bestowed on vs, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

3. Moreover they bring foorth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chryfofome: If this be not the power of our will, to choose good or euill, then they that are partakers of the fame nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is hee, whatsoever he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about under the name of Ambrose, when he make this argument, that no man should euere depart from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is maruell that so excellent men fell beside themselves. For how chanceth it came not in Chryfostomes minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirminth, that al togethers are perverse and giuen to wickednesse: but with him wee adioyneth this that by Gods mercie it commeth to passe that al abide not in peruersenes. Their fore whereas naturally wee are all sick of one diseaue, they onely recover health vpon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by just judgement he paffeth over, pine away in their owne rottennesse till they be consumed. Neither is it of any other cause, that some continue to the end, and some fall in their course begunne. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealth it to whom he pleaseth him selfe. If a man ask for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnsted fastnes, wee knowe none other cause but that God susciteth the one foote strengthened with his power that they perish not, and doeth not give the same strength to the other foot, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

4. Further they press vs, saying, that exhortations are vaineely taken in hande, that the vfe of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fonde thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine he was compelled to write the booke of Correption & grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this summe: O man, in the commandement leare what thou oughtest to doe: in correction leare that by thine owne fault thou haft it not: in prayer leare whence thou maist receiue that which thou wouldst have. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirit and Letter, where hee teacheth that God measureth not the commandements of his lawe by the strength of man, but when hee hath commanded that which is right, hee freely giueth to his elect power.
power to fulfil it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First we are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Nowe let the other looke how they will get the maifiery in striving, that match themselves with such aduersaries. Doeth Christ, which testifieth that we can doe nothing without him, any thing the leffe rebuke and chaflfice them, without him did euill? Doeth he leffe exhorte every man to apply himself to good works? How seuerely doth Paul inuey against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet hee prayeth for charitie to be giuen to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epifde to the Romans, that it is neither of him that willcth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy, yet hee caflfieth not afterwarde to admonith, to exhorte, and to rebuke.

Why doe they not therefore speake to the Lord, that hee doe not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things, which hee himselfe alone can giue, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonith Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to unne, but in the mercie of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lord had not a verie good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readily to be founde of them that reverently seeketh but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the changing of the minde. Paul declar eth, when hee wrieth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor hee that watereth, but the Lord that giueth the encrease onely, effectually worketh. So we see that Moses seuerely stablisheth the commandements of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharply call upon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confess, that men doe then onely waxe wise, when a heart is giuen them to understand, that it is the proper worke of God to circumcise the heartes, and in fleede of stonie heartes to giue hartes of fleshe, to write his lawe in the bowells of men; finally in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuall.

Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose, if they be despisef of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shalbe for a witnewe unto them when they shall come to the judgement fiate of the Lord, yea and even now alreadie they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoever the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorn, yet can he not disprove them: but thou wili say, what may sullie miserable man do, if the softnesse of heart, which was necessarilie required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doeth he excufe himselfe, when he can impute the hardnes of heart to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly readie to mocke them out if they might, are thrown downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chiefe profite towards the faithfull is to be considered: in whom as the Lord worketh all things by his spirite, so he leaueth not the instruments of his word, & vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stonde which is true, that all the strength of the godly refefeth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I wil giue them a new heart, they may walk in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duetie, and not rather left to the direcon of the holy Ghost? why are they mooved with exhortation, Sith they can make make no more hast than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh: why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, 5th they fell by the necessary weakenesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receive the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godly, but to reproove them offynne, they were euen for that thing onely to be counted not altogether vnprouitable. Now, forasmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much auail to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to make of flagglillness, to take away the pleasure and wenious sweetnesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred of inkeomnesse thereof: who dare caus that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer answer, let him take this: God worketh after two forces in his elect, inwardly by his spirit, outwardly by his worde: By his spirit, by enlightning their minds, by framing their hearts to the loue and keeping of justice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, he stirreth them to desire, to seeke & attaine the same renewing, by them both he sheweth forth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution. When he fendeth the same word to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to serve for an other use: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witness of conscience, and may against the day of judgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man commeth to him, but whom the father draweth, & that the elect do come when they have heard and learned of the Father; yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calles them whome it necessarily behooueth to bee inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the favour of death to death, but a sweete saouer to God.

6 They be verie laborious in heaping together of testimonies of scripture: and that they do of purpose, that when they cannot oppresse vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it commeth to hande strokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and shewe souer it hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it be verie eafe for vs to ouerthrow them with all their route. For, because the places that they abuse against vs, when they are once divided into their orders, doe meete upon a fewe special points, we shall with one aunswere satisfie many of them; therefore it shall not be needfull to tarriie vpon dissolving erue one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commandements, which they thinke to be so tempered to our strengths, that whatsoeuer is proued to be required by the one, it necessarily followeth, that it may bee performed by the other. And therefore they runne through erue one of the commandements, and by them doe measure the proportion of our strength. For (say they) either God mocketh vs when hice chargevt vs with holinesse, godlinesse, obedience, chastitie, loue and meekenesse, and when hice forbiddeth vs uncleannesse, idolatry, vnchastenesse, neffe, wrath, robbery, pride, and such like: or he requireth only those things that are in our power. Now, we may divide into three fortes in manner all the commandements that they heape together. Some require our first conversion to God, some speake simply of the keeping of the law; some command vs to continue in the grace of God that we have received. First let vs speake of them all in generaltie, and then descend to the special fortes. To extend the power of man to the commandements of the lawe, hath in deede long agoe begun to be common, and hath some thewe: but it proceeded from most rude ignorance of the law. For they that thinke it a heinous offence, if it be said that the keeping of the lawe is impossibl., doe rest forsooth upon this most strong argument, that else the lawe was giuen in vaine. For they speake in such sort, as if Paul had no where spoken of the lawe. For I beleeech them, what meane these sayings, that the lawe was fett because of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: That the lawe maketh sinne: that the lawe entred, that sinne might abound: was it meant that the lawe was to be limited to our strengthes, least it should be giuen in vaine? or rather that it was set farre aboue vs to conuerc our weakeenesse? Truely by the same mans definition, the ende and fulfilling of the lawe is charitie. But when he with the minde of the Thessalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the lawe soudeth in our eares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our hearts.

7 Truely, if the scripture did teach nothing else, but that the lawe is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeuer: I would also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doeth diligently and plainly declare vs to the manifold vs of the lawe: it is convenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause, it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what we ought to doe, the power to obey commeth of the goodness of God, & therefore mouche vs to prayer, whereby we may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundement and no promisse, then were our strengthes to be tried whether they were sufficient to answer the commaundement, but with there are promisefes ioyned withall, which crye out, by not only our aid, but also all our whole power consisteth in the help of God's grace, they do sufficienty nough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more insufficienct to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengthes with the commaundements of God's lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of justice, which he purposed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakeenesse. Rather by his promisefes we ought to consider, how vnreadie we are of our felues which in euerie behalfe do so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shall be persuaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his lawe to stocks and stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stocks nor stones, when being taught by the lawe that their lustes do strive against God, they are proved guyltie by their owne witnesse. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakeenesse, they flye vnto grace. For which purpose serue these sayings of Augustine. The Lord commandeth those things that we cannot do, that we may know what we ought to ask of him. Great is the profite of the commandementes, if so much be given to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commandeth, yea the lawe therefore commandeth, that faith may obtaine that which was comman deth by the lawe: yea, God requireth faith itselfe of vs, and findeth not what to require, vnlesse he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what hee commandeth, and command what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be seene in rehearsing the three sorte of commandements which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the lawe & in the Prophets, that wee be converted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Convert me Lord, and I shall be converted: for after that thou didst convert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth vs to circumcise the uncircumcised skinne of our heart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hand. He each where requireth newnesse of heart, but in another place he testifieth that it is giuen by himselfe. That which God promiseth (faith Augustine) we do not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note that hee himselfe rehearseth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betweene the lawe and the promises, or betweene the commandements and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commandements whether man be able to do any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commandements themselves are fulfilled. The commandements of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to ferue & cleave vs his will, to keepe his commandementes, to followe his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gift whatsoever righteous, holy, godlie, or purite may be had. Of the third sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithful, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, saith hee, brethren, be ye strong thorough the Lorde. In another place hee forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieue the spirite of God, wherewith we are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that he there requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wissheth it to the Thessalonians, from God, namely that he would reckon them worthie of his holy calling: & fulfill all the purpose of his goodnes, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, entreatring of almes, hee oftentimes commandeth their good & godly wil, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the heart of Titus, to take vp him to giue exhortation. If Titus could not so much as vse the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so far as God did put vnto him, howe should other haue beene willing to doe, vnlesse God himselfe had directed their hearts?

9 The craftie sort of them doe cauill at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that wee may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weake endeavours. They bring also places out of the Pro-

Prophets, where the effect of our conversion seemeth to be parted in half between God and us. Turn ye to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpes the Lord bringeth us, we have above shewed, & it is not needful here to repete it. This one thing I would have granted mee, that it is vainly gathered, that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, because God doth commaunde the obedience of it: For as much as it is evident, that for the fulfilling of all the commaundements of God, the grace of the lawe giveth both necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby then it appeareth, that at the least there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie cannot be wiped away with any caulations: that the covenant of God made with the auncient people was voide, because it was onely literall, and that it could no otherwise be stablished, than when the spiritte commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Turne ye to mee, and I will turne vnto you, favour their errour. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he renueth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by prosperitie of things doth declare himselfe fauourable and mercifull: as by aduertisitie he sometime theweth his displeasure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many fortes of miseries, and calamities, did complaine that God was turned away from them; he anfwereth, that they shall not be destitute of his favour, if they returne to vertuousnes of life, & to himselfe that is the paterne of righteouynes: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawn to this purpose, that the worke of our conversion should seeme to be parted betweene God and men. These things we have comprehended so much the shorter, because the proper place for this matter shalbe where we entreate of the law.

10 The second sort of their arguments is much like vnto the first. They alledge the promises whereby God doeth covenant with our will, of which sorte are: Seek good and not euill, and yee shall liue. If yee will and doe heare, yee shall eate the good things of the earth: but if yee will not, the sword shall devour you, because the Lords mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shal it not be drie out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and doe all his commaundements which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconcincently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefites which the Lorde doeth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lorde doeth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vpon our will, if the same will bee not in our power: And that this liberalitie of GOD should be a goodly thing forsooth, if hee so set his benefites before vs, that wee haue no power to vs them: and a marvellous assurednesse of his promises, which hang vpon a thing impossible, so as they might never be fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition addicted, wee will speake in another place: so that it shall be plaine, that there is no absurditie in

The use of conditionall promises although it be not in our owne power to fulfill the condition whereon they depend. Amos.5,14. Esaie.5,16. Iere.5,4. Deu.28,1. Lcu.16,3.
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place; I deny that God doeth vigently mocketh vs, when hee mouueth vs to desuere his benefites, whome hee knoweth to be vitruely unable to doe it.

For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they haue their see with both sortes. As God with his commandements pricke h: the consciences of the wicked, that they shoulde not too sweetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his judgements: so in his promises hee doeth in a manner take them to witnese, howe vnworthie they are of his goodnesse. For who can deny that it is moste rightfull and conuenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whom hee is honoured, and punish the defpliers of his Maiestie, according to his severitie? Therefore God doeth well and orderly when in his promises hee adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bounde with the fettters of sinne, that they shall then onely enjoy his benefites, if they departe from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may understande that they are worthy excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because hee seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithful to call vp on his grace, it shal not bee inconuenient, if hee attempt the same thing also by promises, which wee haue shewed that hee hath done to great profit with commandements to warde them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commandements, wee are put in minde of our miserie, which doe withall our heart too farre distant from the same, and wee bee therewithal pricked forwarde to call vp on his spiritu, whereby wee may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishe heart is not sufficiently sharpened with commandements, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetenesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that wee haue of righteousnesse, wee may be the more fervent to seke the favour of God. Lo how in these requeites, (if you will: if you shall heare,) the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

11. The thirde sort of their argumentes, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reproocheth the vthankesfull people, and saith that they themselves onely were the cause that they received not of his tender loue all kinde of good things.

Of which sort are the places: Amaleck, and the chanaanee are before you, with whose wordes you shal fall, because you woulde not obey the Lorde, because I called and yee answered not, I will doe to this house as I did to Sило. Againe, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lorde their God, nor hath receiued discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde. Againe, because yee haue harden ed your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euils are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) coulde such reproches be layde against them which might readily answer we? As for vs, wee loued prophesie, and feared aduerstie. Put where as for to obtaine the one and auoide the other wee obeyed not the Lorde, nor hearkened to his voyce: this was the caufe thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, because we were subject to the dominion of sinne. Vainely there-therefore are these evils lay'd to our charge, which it was not in our power to averse. But leaving the pretence of necessitie, wherein they have but a weak & sickly defence, I ask of them whether they can purge them selves of all fault. For if they be found guiltie of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cause reproche them, that it came to pass by their perversities, that they felt not the fruit of his clemencie. Let them answer therefore, whether they can deny, that their froward wil was the cause of their stubbournesse: If they finde the spring head of the euill within them selves, why gape they to finde out foreine causes, that they might seeme not to have beene authors of their own destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both depruis'd of the benefits of God, & chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinately forward in their faultes, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vnjust crueltie: that if they have not cast off all willingnesse to learne, they may be weary of their sinnes, by the deseruings whereof they see them selves miserable & vnson, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemne prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleged, did availe with the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Iewes, to whom Hieremie is commannded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not have fallen otherwife than the Lord had foresaid. Thou shalt speake unto them all these wordes, and they shall not heare thee; thou shalt call them, and they shall not answer thee. To what ende then did they sing to deafe men? that being even loth and vnwilling, yet they should understand? it was true that they heard, that it were wicked facrilege if they should lay upon God the blame of their euils which refted in them selves. By these fewe solutions thou maist easily deliuer thy selfe from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to erect an image of free will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandments as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Pfalme concerning the Iewes: A froward generation that haue not made their heart straights. Also in another Pfalme, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the perversitie of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is only of God. The Prophet saith: I haue inclined my heart to keepe thy commandements, because he had willingly and with a chearfull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet hee doeth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Pfalme, to be the gift of God. Therefore wee must holde in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne saluation with feare and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the perfourming. In deed hee assigneth them offices, to be doing, that they should not give themselves to
fluggishnesse of the flesh; but in that he comman deth them to haue seare and carefulnessse, he so bumbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are comman ded to do, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worke passively, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministr'd them from heauen, that they should claim nothing at all to themselves. Wherefore when Peter exhorrneth vs that wee should adde power in faith, he graunteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing feuerally by our selves, but onely hee awaketh the slothfulnessse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that sayyng of Paul: Extinguith not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doeth oftentimes creep upon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choic to cherish the light being offered them, his ignorance shall be easi confused: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, commeth onely from God. For wee are also oftentimes comman ded to purge our selves from all filthinesse; whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conveyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plain by the wordes of John: Whoseuer is of God, faueth himselfe. The advanturers of free will take holde of this sayynge, as if wee were saued partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though wee had not from heauen the verie same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also pruyerh his Father to saue vs from euill, and wee knowe that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armoure & weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God Wherefore when Peter comman ded vs, to purifie our foules in the obedience of truth, hee by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength are of no force in the spirituall battell, John briefly sheweth, when bee sayeth, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sin, because the seed of God abide in them. And in another place he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victorie that overcommeth the worldly.

Yet ther is alleged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of the lawe, he protesteth vnto the people in this maner. The comman dement that I commound thee this day is not hid from thee, neither farre of: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee; it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest do it. Truely, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandements, I graunt they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were cafe to mocke it out with sayyng, that here is spoken not of the easinessse & readinesse of observation, but of knowledge: ye cuen so, peradventure it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospel. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul viotently wrested those words, y they might be drawn to the Gospel, although his boldnes so to say shal not be without impietie, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to convince him withal. For if Moses spake spake of the commandments only, then he puffed vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they else haue done, but thrown themselves downe hedlong, if they had taken vp vnpon them the keeping of the law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so readie easinesse to keepe the law, where there is no accessse vnto it, but by a hedlong fall to destruction? Wherefore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moses in these words did meane the covenant of mercie, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the law. For in a fewe veries before he had taught, that our hearts must be circumcised by the hand of God, that we may love him. Therefore he placed that easinesse, whereof he streightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the help & succor of the holy Ghost, which perfourmeth his worke mightily in our weakenesse. Albeit the place is not simply to be vnderstanded of the com-mandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospel, which are so far fr6 establishing a power in us to obtaine righteousness, that they utterly over-throwe it. Paul considering that same, proueth by this testimonie, that salvation is offered vs in the Gospel, not vnder that hard & impossible condition, wherewith the law dealeth with vs, that is, that they onely that attaine it which have fulfilled all the commandements, but vnder a condition that is easie, readie, & plaine to come vnto. Therefore this testimonie maketh nothing to chalenge freedom to the will of man.

13 There are also certaine other places woulde be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing the succor of his grace, trieth me, and waiteth to see what ende they will apply their endeaours, as is that place in Osee: I will go to my place, till they put in their heart & fecke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israell would fecke his face, vnslee their minds were pliable that they might after their own wil incline themselves to the one side or the other, As though this were not a thing commonly vied with God in the Prophets, to make a shewe as if he did despise and cast away his people, till they have amended their life. But what will the aduersaries gather out of such threatening?
If they meane to gather, that the people being forsaaken of God, may purpose their owne salvation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing.
If they confesse that the grace of God is necessarie to conversion, why strive they with us? But they to graunt it necessarie, that still they will have mams power preserved unto him. Howe proue they that? truely not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will doe being giuen ouer and left to himselfe, and another thing to helpe his little strength after the meaure of his weakenesse. What then (will some man say) doe these manners of speaking meanes? I answere that they are as much in effect, as if God had said: Forasmuch as I preuaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw my selfe awhile: and sit still and suffer them to bee afflieted:
I will see how farthest, after long miseries, they will begin to remember mee,

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of diverse affliction. Both these things he doeth to humble vs the more.
For we should sooner bee dulled than amended with the scourges of adversitie, vnlesse he did frame vs to that tractabilitie by his spirit.
Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obstinate stubbornesse, doeth for a time leave vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to give vs a certaine presence of himselfe) and doeth make a prooue what we would do in his absence, it is faily gathered hereof that there is any strength of free will that he should beholde & trie, forasmuch as he doeth it to no other ende, but to drue vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

14. They bring alfo for their defence the continuall manner of speaking, that is vted both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no lesse sayde that wee doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, than that wee committe sinnnes. But if sinnes be iuftly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truely in righteous doings also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned vnto vs. For it were against reafon that it should be sayd that we do those things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motion, we are moved by God like stones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shew that our endeavour hath alfo yet a feconde parte. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good workes are called ours, I would object againe, that the bread is called ours, which wee pray to haue giuen vs of God. What will they get by the title of perfection, but that by the bountifulnesse and free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which otherwise is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the fame absurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not reken this to bee laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no propertie, but by the liberalitie of God, But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture of-tenetimes affirmeth that we our selves do worship God, obey the law & apply good workes. Sith these at the duties properly belonging to the minde and will, how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and alfo attributed to vs, vnlesse there were a certaine communicating of our endeavour with the power of God: Out of these snares we shal easily vniuinde our selues, if we well consider the manner how the spirite of the Lorde worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherewith they euloously presie is from the purpose, for who is fo fond to thinke that the moung of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing follow of our doctrine. We reken among the naturall powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will & not to will, to endeuour and to refift, that is, to allow vanitie and to refufe perfec Goodnesse, to wil euill and to be unwilling to goode, to endeuour our selues to wickednes, & to refift righteounnesse. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vfe that peruersenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appoinnteth it to what ende he will, that he by an euil hand may execute his good workes. Shal we then compare a wicked man that so serueth the power of God, when he laboureth only to obey his owne luff, to a stone that being throwne by the violence of an other, is caried neither with moving nor sense: nor will of his owne?

We
We see how much difference there is. But what doeth he in good things, of which is our principal question? when he erecteth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restraineth mans will, that it be not carried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature; and that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousness, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousness: and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth establish & confirm it with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine faith: Thou wilt say vnto me: then are we wrought & work not. Yea, thou both workest & art wrought, and thou workest well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirite of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moving of the Holy ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where hee by and by addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that wee also doe worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing severally to vs: but because he would not cherish slothfulnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of Grace. Therefore he said a little before, Vnlesse God help vs, wee shall not be able to overcomme, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct & gouerne the wil of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnlesse it correct it, reforme it, and renewe it (from whence wee say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and vnlesse it mover it, stirre it, drive it forward, carry it and hold it. Whereupon wee do truely say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholly the only worke of the same grace. In the mean time we deny not that it is verie true that Augustine teacheth, that wil is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things do stand verie well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultiness and peruersenesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of justice: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth utterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrarie, but that we may well be saide to do the same thing that the spirite of God doeth in vs, although our own will do of it selfe giue vs towards it nothing at all, that may be feuered from his grace. And therefore we must keepe that in minde, which wee haue elsewhere alleged out of Augustine, that some do in vaine travaile to find in the will of man some good thing that is properly her owne. For whatsoever mixture men studie to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoever good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to wil, it is not without cause said, that wee doe these things whereof God challengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoever by his goodnesse he worketh in vs, so that we understand it to be not of our selues: and then because the minde is ours, the Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of the endeavours, which are by him directed to good.

16. Those other testimonies beside these, that they refer together here and there, shall not much trouble even our minds that have well conceived only the solutions above said. They allege that saying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be under thee, and thou shalt bear rule over it. Which they expound of sinne, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of sinne should not get the vppper hand in his minde, if he would labour in subduing of it. But wee say that it better agreeeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reproove the wickednes of the enuie that Cain had conceived against his brother. And that he doth two wayes. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excel his brother in Gods sight, before whom no honour is giuen but unto righteousnesse: the other, that he was too much vnthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him subject vnder his authoritie. But least we should seeme therefore to embrace this exposition, because the other is against vs, let vs admit that God spake of sinne. If it be so, then God either promised or commandeth that which he there declareth. If the command, then have we alreadie shewed, that thereby followeth no proff of the power of man. If he promise, where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subject to sinne, over which he should have had dominion. They will say, that in the promise was included a secreter condition, as if it had bin said, that he should have the victorie if he would strive for it. But who will receive these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sinne, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be above our power. Albeit both the matter is selfe & the order of Grammar do require, that there be a comparison made of Cain & Abel, because the elder brother should not have beene set behind the younger, vnlesse he had become worfe by his owne wicked doing.

17. They see also the testimonie of the Apostle, which saith, that it is not of him selfe, nor of him selfe runneth, but of God that hath mercie. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mens wil and endeavours, which of it selfe though it be weak, being holpen by the mercie of God, is not without prosperons successe. But if they did soberly weigh what matter Paul there intreatheth of, they would not so naudiously abuse this sentence. I knowe that they may bring forth Origen and Hierome for mainteiners of their exposition: and I could on the other side set Augustine against them. But what they have thought it maketh no matter to us, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that salvation is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchsaFeth to grant his mercie: and that ruine & destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had vnder the example of Pharaoh declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the affllicted rednesse of free election by the testimonie of Moses, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus vnder standed, will or endeavours are not sufficient, because they are too weake for so great a weight, that which Paul faith, had not bin aptly spoken. Therefore away with these subtleties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Paul's meaning is more simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running that get vs the way to salvation, herein is onely the mercie of God. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that it is good. Tit.3.4.

For peace and kindness of God appeareth not by the works of righteousness which we have don, but for his infinite mercie. They themselfes that make, this argument, that Paul meant, that there is some will and some running, because he said, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not give me leave to reason after the same fashion, that we have don some good works, because Paul faith, that we have not attained the goodness of God by the good works that we have done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shall perceive that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine refleth vpon it, it were therefore faide that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrary part that it is not of the mercie of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurditie, Augustine doth rightfullie conclude, that this is spoke to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that wee ought both to wil and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs. No leffe vnaptly do some wret that saying of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be restrained onely to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselues, but because God doth their service, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie gifts.

18 They bring forthe Ecceflafticus, who, as it is not vnknowne, is a writer of whose authoritie is doubted. But although wee refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he testifie for free will? He faith, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hande of his owne counsell: that commandements were giuen him, which if he obserued, he shoulde againe be preserued by them: that before man was set life and death, good & euil: that whatsoeuer he would, should be giuen him. Became, that man receiued from his creation power to obtain either life of death. What if on the other side we answere that he lost it? Truely my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirminth that man at the beginning was create upright, and he forsooke himselfe many inventions. But because man in swearing, lost as it were by shipwrecke both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answere, not to them only, but to Ecceflafticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meanest to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to atteaine salvation, thy authoritie is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any preijudice, be it never so small, against the undouted word of God. But if thou only study to restraine the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euils vpon God, seeth to seeke a vaine defence for itselfe, and therefore thou answerest that.

that vprightnesse was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destrucion . I willingly agree vnto it : so that a-gaine thou agree in this with mee, that nowe by his owne fault he is spo-lyed of those ornamens, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that so wee confesse together, that nowe he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

19 Yet they have nothing oftener in their mouth than the parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theeeues laide abroad halfe dead in the way. I knowe that it is common almost with all writers, that the calamitie of mankind is represented under the figure of that wayfaring man. There-upon do we aduersaires gather an argument, that man is not so mayned with the robberie of sinne and the diuell, but that he keepe them still remaining the leavings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is saide, that he was left halfe alue. For where is that halfe life, vnlesse some portion both of right reacon and wil remained? First, if I would not give place to their allegoric, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was deii-ued by the fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to go no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before. And ther they be by themselves sufficient to grounde any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, overthrowe this deceived, for the wordes of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is utterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when he spakeith of our redemption, doeth not saye that we were hea-led, when we were halfe dead and halfe alue, but that wee were raied vp a-gaine when we were dead. He calleth not upon them that are halfe alue to receive the light of Christ, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like manner spake the Lorde himselfe, when hee saith, that the houre is come when the dead shall rife againe at his voyce. With what face woulde they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this allegoric haue the force of a certaine testimonie, yet what shall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe alue, therefore he hath somwhat left safe. I graunt he hath a wit capable of understanding, although it pearce not to the heavenly and spiritual wisdomome: he hath true judgement of honestie: he hath some feeling of the godhead, howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truely they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine be taken from vs, which is also approved by common consent of the Scholes: that after mans fall the freely giuen good things, whereupon fuluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall gifts are corrupted and defiled. Let there-fore this truth remaine with vs vndoubted, which can bee shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteousnesse of God, that it conceiueth, coueteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthi-nesse, vnconscionnesse, and misthiefse: that his heart is so thorougly foked in poyson of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they do vttre any goodnesse in theewe, yet still the mind remaineth alway wrapped in hypocriue and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart en-tangled with inward peruersefesse.

The
That man being lost, must seek for redemption in Christ.

Sith all mankind hath perished in the person of Adam, that excellency and nobilitie of beginning which we have spoken of, would so little profite vs, that it would rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeareth the redeemer in the person of his only begotten sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sin to be his works. Therefore lthough we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creator whereof we haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting forth God a father vnto vs in Christ. Truely this was the natural order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole vnto vs to learn goodnesse, from whence might be made a passage for vs to eternal life and perfect felicitie: but since our falling away, whither fower we turne our eyes, upward and downward, the curse of God still presenteth it selue vnto our sight, which while it posseth and envwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needs overwhelme our owne foules with desperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly favour towarde vs doe still many wayes appeare; yet by beholding of the world we cannot gather that he is our Father when our conscience inwardly pricketh vs, and theweth that there is in sin just cause of forsaking, why God shoulde not account vs for vs for his children. Beside that there is in vs both slouthefulnessse and vnthankfulnessse: because both our mindes, as they bee blinded, doe not see the truth, and alfo as all our senses be pervertse, wee maliciously defraude God of his glorie. Therefore wee must come to that saying of Paul: because in the wisedome of God, the world knew not God by wisedome, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to saue them, that beleue. The wisedome of God hee calleth this honourable stage of heaven and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof we ought wisely to haue known God. But because wee so ill profited therein, hee calleth vs backe to the faith of Christ, which for that it feemeth foolish, the vnbelieuers do disdaine. Wherefore although the preaching of the crosse doe not agree with mans wit, yet ought wee humbly to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator & maker, that he may beginne againe to be our father. Truely since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God availed to saluation, without the Mediator. For Christ spake not of his owne age only, but comprehended all ages, when hee faith that this is the eternal life, to knowe the father the one true God, and him whom he hath sent Jesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their sluggishnesse, which take upon them to set open heauen to all prophane & vnbelieuering men, without his grace, whom the Scripture calleth to be the only gate whereby wee enter into saluation. But if any will restrate that saying of Christ onely to the publishing of the Gospel, wee haue in readinesse wherewith to confute him. For this hath beene a common sentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are estranged from God, & pronounced accursed, & the children of

of wrath, cannot please God. And here may be also alleged that which Christ answered to the woman of Samaria: Ye worship what ye know nor, but we worship that which we know: because the salvation is from the Jews, in which words he both condemneth of all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redeemer was promised under the law to the only chosen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worship ever pleased God, but that which had respect unto Christ. For which cause also Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and void of the hope of life. Now where as John teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that all the world fell from it, we must return to the same fountain Christ. And therefore Christ, in so much as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himself to be the life. And truly the entrance of heaven belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meet that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the only begotten Sonne. And John plainly testifieth, that they which believe in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of faith in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to have touched it by the way.

2 And therefore God never shewed himself merciful to the old people, nor ever did put them in any hope of grace without the mediatour. I omit to speake of the sacrifices of the lawe, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that salvation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was perfourmed by Christ alone. Only this I say, that the blessed & happy state of the church hath bin alway grounded upon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his covenant, yet doth Paul wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seede in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we know that not all they were reckened his seede that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Israel and other) howe came it to passe, that of the two sones of Isaac, that is Esau and Jacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen, the other refused. Yea, how came it to passe that the elder was rejected and the younger only tooke place? And how also came it to passe, that the greater part shoulde be forsaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckened in one person, and that the promised salvation did never stande sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang upon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it be so plainely worded expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly known to all the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hana the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicite of the godly, even then saide thus in her song: God shall give strength to his king, and shall exalt the horne of his anointed. In which wordes shee meaneth that God shall bless his Church. Wherewith also agreeeth the oracle that is within a little after adjoined: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walke before mine annointed. Nei-Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly father was to have the lively image of Christ to be seen in David & his posterity. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the fear of God, he biddeth them to kiss tho Sonne. Whereewith this saying of the Gospel also agreeeth: He that honoureth not the Sonne, honour eth not the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdom decayed; yet it behooved the coven- nant to stand which God had made in David and his successors: as also he said by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut the kingdom, for David my servants sake, and for Hierusalem's sake, whom I have chosen: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressely added: I will afflict the seed of David, but not for ever. Within a little space of time after, it is said: For David his servants sake God hath given a light in Hierusalem to raise vp a sonne and to keep Hierusalem in safety. Now when the state grew towards de-struction, it was said againe: God would not scatter Juda for David his servants sake, because hee had spoken that hee would give a light to him and his sonsnes for ever. Finally, this is the summe, that all other being passed over, only David was chosen, vpon whom the good pleasure of God shoulde rest. As in another place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, & the tabernacle of Levi, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Juda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. Hee hath chosen his servant David to seede Iacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to save his church, that the safety and preservation thereof should hang vpon that one head, & therefore David crieth out, The Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the sal- vations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a prayer: Save thy people & blest thine inheritance meaning that the state of the Church is with unseparable knot joyned to the governement of Christ. And in the same mean- ing in another place: Lord save vs: Let the king heare vs in the day that we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithfull did vpon none other confidence fly to the helpe of God, but because they were hidden vnder the succour of the king, Which is gathered by an other Psalm. Lord save vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lorde. Where it is plainly enough, that th faithful are called backe vnto Christ, that they may hope that they shall be saued by the hand of God. The same respect hath the other prayer, where al the Church calleth vpon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hande, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou haft preferued (or appointed) to thy self. For though the author of the Psalm bewyleth the scattering abroad of the whole people, yet hee prayeth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, & all things to mans seeming destroyed, Jeremie lamenteth the overthrow of the Church, he doeth principally com- plaine that by destruction of the kingdom all hope was cut off from the faithful. Christ (faith he) the spirite of our mouth is taken in our finnes, to whom we said: In thy shadow we shall liue among the nations. Hereby nowe it sufficiently appeareth that because God cannot be mercifull to mankinde without the Mediator, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fa- thers.

The ancient Prophets never spake of the churches deliverance out of miserie, but they taught them, that through Christ they were delivered.

3 Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliverance of the Church is described, there the banner of assurance & hope is aunawed in Christ alone. God went out to the saving of his people with his Messiah, sayeth Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call back the people to the promise made to David, concerning the everlasting continuance of the kingdom. And for otherwherie there had beene no assurance of the couenant. For which purpose saith that notable answer of Esay. For when he sawe that the unbelieuung king Abaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present saffetie, as it were suddenly, he passed over to Messias. Behold a virgin shall conceuie and bring forth a fonne, meaning indirectly that though a king & his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselves to discredite the truth of God, yet the couenant should not be vnde, but that the redeemer shoulde come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the ende they might shewe that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdom of David, whereupon hanged the redemption and everlasting saffetion. So Esay faith: I will make a couenant with you the faithfull mericies of David. Behold I have given him for a witness vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their flate is at the worste, could not otherwise haue any hope, but by the means of him being witness, that God would be appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremie, to raise them vp being in delphaire, sayeth: Beholdie the dayes come, wherein I will raise vp vnto David a righteous branche, and then shall Juda be saued, and Israel shall dwell in saffetie. And Ezechiel saith: I will raise vp one sheepeheard ouer my sheepe, even David my seruant. I the Lord will be a God to them, and my seruant David for a sheepeheard. And I will make a couenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after he had entreated of the incredible renewing he faith: my seruant David shall be their king, and there shall be one sheepeheard ouer all, and I will make an everlasting couenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places out of many, because I onely mean to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene repose no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeably herunto, as it is saide in Osee. The children of Juda and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall appoint to themselues one head. Which he atterwarde more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall secke for the Lorde their God and David their king. And Micah speaking of the returne of the people expressly sayeth, The king shall go before them, and the Lorde in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renewing of the people faith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of David that is fallen downe, and I will hedges vp the gappes, and raise vp the places overthrown, even because that was the onely standard of saffetion, to haue the royall glory to rise vp againe on high in the stocke of David, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doeth he more plainly cry ou: be glad.
It was a common principle generally receiv'd amongst the Jews, that God, by the hande of Christ, as he had promised to David, would be the delieverer of the Church, and so the covenant should be of his own free grante, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this song founded in the mouth of the children when Christ a little before his death entred into Hierusalem, Hosanna, to the sonne of David. For it appeareth that it was commonly known and spoken of, and according to common use that they sang that the onely pledge of God's mercie remain'd vnto them, in the coming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainly and perfectly beleue in God, biddeth them to beleue on himselfe, Beleeue ye in God (faith he) then beleue also in mee. For though (to speake properly) faith commeth vp from Christ to the father, yet hee meaneth that the same faith, albeit it rest vpone God, doeth by little & little vanish away vnlesse he become a meane to hold it in assured steadfastnesse. Otherwise the majestie of God is too high for mortall men, which creepe vpon the gronde like worms, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that common saying, that God is the object of faith, but in such sorte that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of god, but by this title we are put in minde, that if we finde not God in Christ, saluation cannot be kno'vn vnto vs. For although among the Iewes, the Scribes and Pharisees had darken'd with falsie inventions, that which the Prophets had spoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ tooke it for a thing comfess'd as receiv'd by common consent, that there was none other remedie in a dispered case, & none other meane of delievering the Church, but by givins the Mediator. In deede that was not commonly known among the people as it ought to have bin, which Paul teacheth, that Christ is the end of the lawe. But how true and assured it is, doeth plainly appeare by the law & the Prophets. I speake not yet of faith, because there shall be else where a more convenient place for it. Only let the readers hold this as fast establish'd, that the first degree of godlinesse be, to acknow'dge God to be a Father vnto vs, to defende, gouerne and cherish vs, till he gather vs together into the euerlastinge inheritance of his kingdome: & that hereby it plainly appeareth which we said eu'n now, the knowledge of god which bringeth saluation, standeth not without Christ, & that therefore from the beginning he hath bene set foorth vnto all the elect, that they should looke vpon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Irenæus, that the Father which is vnmeasurable, is in his Sonne measur'd, because he hath applied himself to the measure of our capacitie, leaft he should drowne our mindes with the vnmeasurablenes of his Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of his glorie. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, doe wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christ but a portion of the godhead derived from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone. That saying of John hath always beene true. Hee that hath not the sonne, neither hath he the Father. For though in olde time many did boaste that they worshipped the feueraigne God, the maker of heaven & earth: yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible: that they Shoulde truly taste of the mercie of God, & so be persuaded that he was their father. Therefore because they knewe not the head that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them, whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into groffe and vilifie superstitions, they bewrayed their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turkes although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heaven & earth is their God, yet do they thrust an idole in place of the true God while they swarve from Christ.

The vii. Chapter.

That the lawe was given, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of salvation in Christ, untill his comning.

//By this continuall practive that we haue recheated, may be gathered, that the Lawe was added about foure hundred yeares after the death of Abraham, not for this entent to lead away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comning, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, that they shoulde not waxe faint with long variance. I meane by this worde Law, not only the tenne commandements, which prescribe a rule howe to live godliely and righteously, but also the forme of religion delivered by the hande of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawyer to abolish the blessing promised to the kindred of Abraham: but rather wee see howe every where hee puttheth the leues in remembrance of the free covenant made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if hee had bene sent to renue the same. That was most plainly feeth forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer vp loathsome stinke of the sate of cartell, to reconcile themselvese to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloud to wash away their filthinesse? Finally, all the service of God appointed in the lawe (if it be considered by it selfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the trueth should answere vnto) had but a verie mockerie. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, and in the Epistle to the Hebrewes is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commandeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the patterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spiritual thing appointed they should renue vnto, the leues shoulde no leffe have fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men y never earnestly applied the study of godlines, cannot without lothsome tediousnes abide to hearre so many sundry fashions of vsages: & they not only marvel why God wearied his people with such a heape which heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorne them as childrens plays. And the cause is, for that they consider not the ende, from which if the figures of the law be seuered, they must needs be condemned of vanity. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore command sacrifices because he would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their mindes higher. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spirituall. This doe the sayings of the Prophets testifye, wherein they rebuke the lewes of sluggisshnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate anything from the law? No, but according as they were true expositours of the lawe, so they woulde by this meane haue mens eyes directed to the marke from which the common people strayed. Now by the grace offered to the lewes it is certeiny gathered, that the lawe was not voide of Chrift. For Moses did set forth vnto them this ende of the adoption, that they should become a prieftly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine vnlesse there were had for the meane thereof a great and more excellent reconciliacion, than by the bloud of beasts. For what is leffe like ly than Adama children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondflues of sinne, to be aduaned to royall dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glorie of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefite should come vnto them from elsewhere than from themselves? Also howe could the right of priefthood remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of sinnes were abominable to God, vnlesse they had beene consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth verie aptly turne that saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fullnesse of grace, the taft whereof the lewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Chrift: Ye are (saith he) a chosen kin dred, a kingly priefthoode. For to this end tendeth that turning of the words, to shewe that they, to whome Chrift appeared by the Gospell, have obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both with prieftly and kingly honour, that trusting vpon their mediatour, they may freely be bold to come forth into the fight of God.

2. And here by the way it is to bee noted, that the kingdome which at length was errected in the house of David, is part of the lawe, and contained vnder the ministerie of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that as well in all the kindred of the Lewes as in the povereity of David Chrift was set before the eyes of the olde people as in a double looking glasse. For, as I faide euen nowe, they could not otherwise be before god either kings or priefts, which were both the bondflues of sinne and of death, and defiled by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, that the Lewes were holien as vnder the keeping of a scholemaster, til the seede came for whose sake the promife was giuen. For, because Chrift was not yet familiarly knowne, they were like vnto children, whose weaknesses could not yet beare a full knowledge of heavenely things, but how they were by ceremonies as it were lead by the hande to Chrift, is spoken before, & may be better understood by many testimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to come daily with newe sacrifices to appease God:
yet Esay promiseth that all their sinnes shalbe cleansed with one onely sacrificiue. Wherewith Daniel agreeably fayeth: The Prieffes appointed of the tribe of Levi, did enter into the Sanctuary; but of the only priest it was once said, that by an oath he was chosen of God to be a prieffe for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oil was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shalbe another manner of anointing. And because I will not carrie upon many examples, the author of the Epifle to the Hebrews euen from the 4. chapter to the xi. doth largely and plainly enough shewe, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth & vaine till we come to Christ. As concerning the ten commandements: that leffon of Paul is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the ende of the law into Salluation, to crucifie one that belieueth. And an other leffon, that Christ is the Spirette that quickeneth the letter which of it self flaieth. For in the firft of these two, he meaneth that righteousneffe is vaine lytly taught by commandements, vntill Christ do giue it both by free imputation and by the spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it shoulde nothing profite vs to knowe what God requireth of vs, unlesse he did succour vs faining and oppreffed under the yoke and vntolerable burden. In another place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humiliation being proud guiltie of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to seek Christ, whatsoever he teacheth in divers words do all verie wel agree together. But because he then was in contention with peruerfe teachers, which fained that we do def тре righteousnes by the works of the lawe, to confute their error, he was compelled sometime to speake precifely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is cloathed with the covenant of free adoption.

3 But now it is good to knowe, how being taughed by the morall lawe, wee are made more inexcufable, that our owne guiltinesse may move vs to crave pardon. If it be true that wee be taught perfection of righteousnesse in the lawe; then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousnesse before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heavenly throne of judgement. Wherefore Moses when he had publisshed the lawe, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had fet before Israel life and death, good & euill. And we may not deny, but that the reward of eternal salvation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promiseth it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether we performe that obedience, vpon defeet whereof we may conceive a fruit of that reward. For to what small purpose is it, to see the reward of eternal life set in keeping of the lawe, unlesse we further knowe whether wee may by that way attaine to eternal life? But herein the weaknesses of the lawe doth shewe it selfe. For because that keeping of the lawe is found in none of vs all, wee are excluded from the promises of life, and doe fall into curse onely. I do not now tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre aboue the power of man, he may in deed come farre off, look at the promises, but yet not gather any fruit of them. Therefore this one thing

thing remaineth, that by the goodness of them he may the better weye his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of salvation being cut off, death doth certainly hang over him. On the other side do præfso vs terrible penallawes, which do hold entangled and fast bound, not only a fewe of vs, but every one without exception: they præfso vs, I say, and doe pursuie vs, with an unappeasable rigour, so that we may see most present death in the lawe.

4 Therefore if we looke only uppon the law, we can doe nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and dispose, forasmuch as by it we are all damned & cursed, & kept farre off from the blessednesse that he offereth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how smalllly doeth it differ from mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhort men into it, to protest that it is layde open for vs, when in the meanes reason the entrie into it is foreclosed & impossible to be come to? I answer: although the promises of the law, in so much as they are conditionall, do hang upon the perfect obedience of the law, which can no where be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they shall be void and of no effect vnto vs, vnlesse God embrace vs with his free goodnesse without regard of our works, & vnlesse we do imbrace by faith the same goodnesse giuen vs by the gospel, then want they not their effectualnes, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doeth so freely giue all things vnto vs, that he addereth this also to the heape of his bountifullnesse, that not refusing our halfe full obedience, & remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he so maketh vs to enjoy the fruit of the promises of the law, as if we our selues had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this present procede no further in this matter, because it shall bee more largely to be entreated of, when we shall speake of the iustification of faith.

5 Whereas we saide that it is impossible to keepe the law, that is in fewe wordes to be both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accompted an opinion of great absurditie, so farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed: what Hierome thought, I do nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is trueth. I will not here make long circumstances of diverse sortes of possibilities. I call that impos- sible, which both never hath beeene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it never hereafter may be. If wee record from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath ever attained to that full perfection of love, to love God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power: Againe, that there hath bene none that hath not bin troubled with concupiscence. Who can say nay? I see in deed what maner holy men foolish superstition doth imagine vnto vs, even such whose purenesse the heavenly Angels do scarcely counternaile: but against both the Scripture and prove of experience. I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the marke of true perfection, vnlesse he be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon saide, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that sinneth not. And David saide: every living man shall not bee

Ifustified in thy sight. Iobin many places affirmeth the same. But Paul most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. And by no other reason he proveth that all that are under the law are subject to the curse, but because it is written, that cursed are all they that do not abide in all the commandments thereof, meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoever is forespoken by the Scriptures, that must be held for perpetually, yea and necessarie, With such futile did the Pelagians trouble Augustine, saying, that there is wrong done to God, to say that heeth doth command more than the faithful are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to avoid their caullation confessed, that the Lord might in deed, if hee would, aduance a mortal man to the purenesse of Angels: but that hee neither hath done it at any time, nor will do, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that do I also not deny. But I add further, that it is inconvenient to dispute of his power against his truth, and that therefore this sentence is not subject to caullations: if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, whereof the Scriptures doe pronounce that it shall no: be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saved, he answered: with men in deed it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stifferly defendeth, that in this flesh we never yelde to God the due love that we owe him. Love (faith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly love God, but he that hath first fully known his goodnesse. Wee, while we wander in this world, see by a glasse and in a darke speache: it followeth therefore, that our love is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controversy, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfill the lawe, if wee behold the weaknesse of our owne nature, as it is also yet also in another place be proved by Paul.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vse of the law which they call Morall. Now, as farre as I understand, it is conteined in these three partes. The first is, that while it sheweth to every man the rightouesnes of God, that is, the rightouesnes which only is acceptable to God, it admonisheth, certify, proue guilty, yea & condemne every man of his owne vnrightouesnes. For so is it needful that man blinded & drunk with loue of himselfe, be druen both to the knowledge & the confession of his owne weaknesse & vncleneannes: for as much as if his vanitie be not evidently convinced, he swelleth with mad affiance of his owne strengthe, and can nether bee brought to thinke of the slendernesse thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soon as he beginneth to compare his strengthe to the hardenesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoeuer he before conceived a great opinion of it, yet by & by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, & then to shake & falte, at last even to fall down & faint. So being taught by the scholing of the law, he putteth off that arrogancy wither before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disea of pride, whereof wee haue saide that hee is sicke. So long as he is suffered to stande to his owne judgement, hee doth as

Hypocrifie in deed of righteousnesse, wherewith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wote not what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so soon as he is compelled to trie his life by the balance of the lawe, then leaving the presumption of the counterfeit righteousnesse, he feeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Againe, that he floweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he seemed cleane. For the eues of lust are hidden in so deepe and crooked prieue corners, that they easily deceive the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle faith, that he knewe not lust, except the law had said: Thou shalt not lust: because except it be by the lawe disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly dace thereof.

7 So the lawe is like a certaine looking glasse wherein wee beholde, first our weakenesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, even as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spottes of our face. For when power faileth man to followe righteousnesse, then must he needs sticke fast in the mire of finnes. And after finne by and by volonte curse. And of how much the greater trespass the lawe holdeth vs guilty and convict, with so much the more gresius judgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of finne. For there he speaketh only of the first office of the lawe, the profe whereof is in finnes not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the lawe entred that finne might abound, & therefore that it is the ministration of death that worketh wrath and slaieth. For without doubt so much more growth iniquitie, with how much more understanding of sinne the conscience is striken, because vnto breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the finner, because of it felie it can doe nothing but accuse, condemn and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, solely to this end, to accuse vs & kil vs. And yet when this is saide, neither is the lawe dishonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellency thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly the only knowledge of it were sufficient to salvation. But as much as our fleshly & corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemie with the spiruall lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for salvation, (if it had founde fit hearers) turneth to the occasion of finne and death. For whiche we are all proued transgressors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it discloseth our inquities. the more surely that it confirmeth the rewarde of life and salvation laid vp for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore that these sayings should be to the dishonour of the lawe, that they much availe to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruerfora, that we enjoy not the blessednesse of life yet openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the succour of the lawe, is made so much the sweeter,
Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of

to grace is sweeter, & the mercie more louely that giueth it vnto vs, wherby we learne that he is never wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new giftes vpon vs.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimonie of the lawe, it is not done for this purpose (if at least we well profit in it) to make vs fall down with despaire, or with discouraged minde to tumble downe headlong. In deed the reprobate are anased after that maner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoueth to be another ende of instruction. I grant the Apostle testifieth that wee are all condemned by judgement of the lawe, that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the worlde may become bounde vnto God: but yet the same Apostle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbelief, not to destroye all, or to suffer all to perish, but that he might have mercie of all, that leaving the foolish opinion of their owne strength, they might understand, that they stande and are uphelden by the onely hande of God: that they being naked and emptie, may flee to his mercy, that they may rest themselves wholy vpon it, hide themselves wholly in it, take holde of it alone in stead of righteounesse & merites, which is laide open in Christ for all men who so ever they be that with true faith doe desire and looke for it. For God in the commandements of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteounesse, whereas we all are destitute, and on the other side a rigorous judge of evil doings. But in Christ, his face shineth full of grace and lenitie, even towards the wretched and vnworthie sinners.

9 Of profiting, to crave the grace of his helpe, Augustine speaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The lawe commandeth that endeauouring to doe the thinges commanded, and being wearied with our weaknesses vnder the lawe, we should learne to ask the helpe of grace. Against to A$$; The profit of the lawe is to convince man of his owne weaknesses, and compel him to crave the Physicke of grace that is in Christ. Against to In$$; The lawe commandeth, and grace ministreth strength to do. Against to V 알; God commandeth those things that we cannot doe, that we may learne to knowe what to ask of him. Against: The lawe was giuen to accuse you, that being accused you should seare, that searing you shoule craue pardon, and not presume of your owne strengthes. Against: The lawe was giuen for this purpose, of great to make little, to shewe that thou haft no strengthe of thine owne to righteounesse, that thou art poore, vnworthie and needy, I shouldest flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his speeche to God and saith: Do so Lord, do so mercifull Lord, commannde that which cannot be fulfilled: yea, commannde that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfill it by their owne strengthe, every mouth may be stopped, and no man may think him selfe great. Let all be little ones, and let all the worlde be guiltie before thee. But I am not wise to heap vp so many testimonies, that that holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirit and Letter. The second profiting be doeth not so liuely describe, either because he knewe that it did hang vpon the former, or because he did not so wel under stand understand it, or because he wanted words whence distinctly & plainly to express his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceived: but this first office of the law is not idle even in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus farre forward with the children of God, that after the throwing down of their flesh they be renewed & flourish againe in the inward man, but amazed with the first terror do lie still in desperation: yet it serveth to shew forth the equitie of Gods judgement, that their consciences be tossed with such wayes. For they ever willingly desire to make shift against the judgement of God. Now while the same is not yet opened, they yet so affronted with the testimonie of the lawe and their conscience doe betray in themselves what they have defereted.

10 The second office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with noe care of that which is just & right, vaineely be compelled, when they heare the terrible penal ordinances therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inwarde mind is moued or affected withal, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke, & do keepe in their perversnesse within them, which otherwise they would haue outrageously poured out. Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being lettered either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practise which they have conceiued in their mind, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare & obedience of God, yea, the more that they haue backe themselves, so much the stronger within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, ready to doe any thing, & to break forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spitefully hate the lawe, and do detest God the lawmaker, so that if they could, they would verie saine take him away, whome they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth rightfull things, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the despisers of his maieftie. In some in deed more darkly, & in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the lawe not by willing submission, but resifting and against their wills, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousnesse is necessary for the publike common state of men, the quiet whereof is herein preserved for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with vprore, which woulde come to passe, if all things were lawfull for all men. Yea, it is not unprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Scholing, so long as they before their calling being yet destitute of the spirite of sanctification, are still wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outward licentiosoises, by the terror of Gods vengeance, although for they are not yet tamed in mind, they go for the present time but a little forwarde, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yoke of Christ, so that where they are called, they be not altogether rude and rawe to discipline, as to a thing unknown. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to have touched, when he faith that the law was not set for the righteous man, but for the vni- righteous and disobedient, wicked and sinners, euill doers and prophanes, flayers.

The second office of the law is the bridling of their wantonnesse sloth-rough feare of punishment, & home the spirit of sanctification hath not yet enuish'd with an inward heart dese and desire otherwisse to serve God.

flayers of their parents, & murderers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, liers & periured men, & whatsoever else is against sound doctrine. For he faith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

\[11\] But to both may that be applied which hee saith in another place, that the lawe was to the leues a schoolemaister to Christ, so there are two farts of men, whome with her schooling the leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one, of whom we first spake, because they are too full of affiance of their owne strength or righteounes, are not meete to receive the grace of Christ, vntill he be first emptied: therefore the lawe bringeth them downe to humiliation by knowledge of themselves, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other wantonnesse of their flesh, that they fall off altogether from all studie of righteounesse. For where the spirite of God doeth not yet governe, there sometime lustes do so boyle, that it is in great peril least they throwe downe the soule that is subject to them into the forgetfulness & despising of God: and so would it come to passe if God did not with this remedie provide for it. Therefore those whome he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdom, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the works of the lawe vnnder feare, vntill the time of his visitation, not that chaste and pure feare such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlineesse. Of this we have so many proues, that it needeth no example. For wholesoeuer haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare & obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirite, they began heartily to louse him.

\[12\] The third use, which is also the principal use, & more nearly looketh vnto the proper end of the lawe, concerneth the faithful, in whose hearts alreadie liueth & reigneth the spirite of God. For although they haue the lawe written & graven in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirite that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two wayes profite in the lawe. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily better & more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto, and may be confirmed in the understanding thereof. As if a seruant be alreadie bent with all the affection of his heart, to please his Lord; yet hath he neede diligently to search out & make the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame & apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of you exempt himself from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by daily instruction of the lawe get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because we neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profit shall the seruant of God take by the law, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slipperie way of offending. For after this manner, must these holy ones drive forward their selves, which with howe great cheere chearfulness so ever they travaile to Godwarde according to the spirite, yet they are alwaye laden with the sluggishnesse of the fleth, that they proceed not with such full readinesse as they ought. To this fleth is the lawe giuen as a whippe, that like a lowe and dull Alse it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the fleth, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stande still. Euen to this vse David had respect, when he did set forth the lawe with those notable praifes: The lawe of the Lorde is vndefiled, converting soules: the justices of the Lorde are vpright, and cheereng heares: the commandement of the Lorde is bright, that gyuen light to the eyes, &c. Again: A lanterne to my feete is thy worde, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what vse the lawe miniftreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to giue to man of it selue. But here the Prophet reporteth with howe great profite the Lorde doth instruct them by reading of his lawe, to whome hee inwardely inspiereth a readinesse to obey. And he taketh holde not of the commandements only, but also the promife of grace annexed to the things which onely maketh the bitternesse to waxe sweete. For what were leffe amiable than the lawe, if it should onely with requiring & threatening trouble soules carefully with feare, and vexe them with terror? But specially David sheweth, that he in the lawe conceived the Mediatour, without whom there is no deite or sweetenesse.

13 While which some vnskillfull men can not discerne, they boldely shake away all Moses, and bide the two tables of the lawe farewell, because they think it is not agreeable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that containeth the ministration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same Lawe which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to have a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly said to the people: Lay your hearts vpon all the words that I do teuicte to you this day, that ye may committetheynottoyour children, that yee may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfil all the things that are written in the volume of this lawe, because they are not vaine commannded you, but that every one sould live in them. But if no man can deny that there appeareth in it an absolute paterne of righteousness, then either wee must have no rule at all to live justly and vprightly, or else it is not lawfull for vs to depart from it. For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed. Therefore, whereas David maketh the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the lawe, let vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the ende of the worlde: and let vs not therefore bee fraied awaye, or flye from being instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exact holynesse than wee shall perfoume, while we shall carrie about the person of our body. For nowe it executeth not against vs the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be satisfied, but with his full taske perfoumed: but in this perfection wherunto it exhorteth vs, it sheweth thereof a marke, towards which in all our life to endeavor, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our duties. In which endeavor if we fail not, it is well: For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that marke, toward which our endeavors do trauail a farre off.

14. Nowe therefore, whereas the lawe hath toward the faithful a power to exhort, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curfe, but such as with often calling on, may take off sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to express the deliverance from the curfe thereof, do say, that the lawe is abrogate to the faithful. (I speake yet of the law moral) not that it doth not more command them that which is right, but only that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by making afraine and confounding their consciences, damne and destroy them: And truly such an abrogation of the lawe, Paul doth plainly teach, and also that the Lorde himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this that he would not have confused that opinion that he should dissolue the lawe, vnlesse it had beene commonly received among the Jewes. But forasmuch as it could not rise causelessly and without any colour, it is likely that it grewe vpon false understanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errors are wont to take occasion of truth, but least we should also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lorde protesteth that he came not to destroy the lawe, but to fulfill it: and that till heaven and earth passe away, no one iote of the lawe should passe away, but that all should be fulfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the lawe. And for good cause: sith he came, rather for this end, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the lawe remaineth for all Christians, inuiolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to euery good worke.

15. As for those things that Paul speaketh of the curfe, it is evident that they belong not to the verie instruccion, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the law not onely teacheth, but also with authoritie requireth that which it commaundeth. If it be not performed, yea if dutie be slackd in any part, it bendeth her thunderboulte of curfe. For this cause the Apostle sayth, that all they that are of the workes of the lawe, are subject to the curfe, because it is written: Cursed is euery one, that fulfilleth not all. And he faith, that they be vnder the works of the lawe, that doe not set righteoufnesse in the forgiueneffe of finnes, by which we are loosed from the rigour of the lawe. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosd from the bonds of the lawe, vnlesse wee will miserably perill vnder them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the law, & suffreth no other offence vnpunished. From this curfe (I say) that Christ might redeem vs, he was made a curfe for vs. For it is written: Cursed is euery one that hangeth upon the tree. In the chapter following in deede he faith, that Christ was made subject to the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe: but all in one

meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption wee might receive the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetual bondage; that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshaken, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authorities of the lawe, but that it ought still to be receiued of vs with the same reverence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which wee abrogate not in effect, but in use onely. And this, that Christ by his coming hath made an ende of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should have gien but a vaine shewe to the olde people, vnlesse the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had bin shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discerne to what purpose they were ordaine. Therefore Paul, to prove that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore howe in the abolishing of them, the true and better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile spred before, shew a figure of Christ that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was tornne in two pieces & fell downe; because nowe the true express image of the heavenly good things was come to light, which before had bin but vnperfectly begun with darke rude draughtes, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues faith. Hereunto musteth that laying of Christ, that the lawe and the Prophets were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forward, the kindome of God began to be as in the full light. But why it behooved that the Church of God should clime vp higher from those first instructions, Iohn the Baptists declareth, for that the lawe is gien by Moses, but grace and truth began by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of finnes were truely promised in the olde sacrifices, and the Arke of the covenante was a sure pledge of the fatherly favour of God, yet all this had bin but a shadowe, if it had not bin grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is found, perfect, and eternall steadfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall vantages of the law haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the end of them it is the better known how great was the profit of them before Christs coming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

17 Somewhat more harde is the point that Paul nothere. And he hath reuened you together with him, when ye were dead by finnes, and the vn circumcision of your flesh, forgiving you al your offences, blotting out your handwriting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the lawe somewhat further that nowe we have nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expounde it of the lawe morall, whose unappeaseable rigor rather then doctrine thereof they thinke

think to be taken away. Some more deeply waying the words of Paul, do else see that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremoniall, and doe shewe that this word Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he sayeth thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the lawe of commandements consisting in the decrees, that hee might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Jews were seperated from the Gentiles: wherefore I grant that those first expostors are rightly reproued by these: but yet mee thinkes that these do not sufficiently well set forth the mind of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to have these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertere the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the usages of washings and sacrificers, wherewith the Jews were made holy unto the Lord, doe feuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he teacheth a hygher mysterie? In deed the point of the disputacion there, is of Mosaicall observances whereunto the false Apostles did labour to drive the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galatians he fetceth that controversie further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to calit a hand writing against vs? moreover to set the whole summe in a maner of our redemption in this, y it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter itself trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trufl that I have attained the naturall vnderstanding of it, if at least this be granted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine wordes of the Apostle, that in the Jewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they elie by sacrificers, but confesse themselves in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleanings in their place? What did they with their cleanings, but testifie themselves to be vnclean? And so was the handwriting of their sinne & vncleannes often renued by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle wretteth that at length by meanes of the death of Christ, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained vnnder the old Testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily call the ceremonies handwritings against those, which obserue them: forasmuch as by them they did openly scale to their own damnation & vncleannes. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doth seuer from Christ, because being at that time vfed, they did obscure the glory of Christ. Thus learn we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselves, are well & fitly called handwritings against the salvation of men, because they were as solemn instruments they testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to bind the Christian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what point they should fall backe againe, if they suffered themselves in such sorte to be yoked by them. For therewithall was the benefite of Christ wrested away from them, inasmuch as he having once performed the eternall cleansing, hath utterly abolished those daily obseruations which were onely of force to scale sinnes, but couldde doe nothing to the putting away of them.

Here I thinke it shall not be from the purpose, to enterrace the tene commandementes of the lawe with a short exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appear which I have touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then also wee shall have besides that a prooff of the seconde point, that the Iewes did onely learne by it what was the true force of godlinesse, but also by the terror of the judgement, sith they sawe themselfes vnable to kepe it, they were compelled whether they would or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Nowe in setting forth the summe of those things that are required in the true knowledge of God, wee haue alreadie taught, that wee cannot conceive him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maieftie presenteth it selle vnto vs, to binde vs to the worship of him. In the knowledge of our selues wee haue set this for the chief point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strength, and cleane stript of the trust of our owne righteouesnesse, and on the other side discouraged & beaten downe with conscience of our owne needinesse, wee should learne perfect humilitye and abasement of our selues. The Lord setteth forth both these pointes in the lawe, where first challenging to himselfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reverence of his diuine maieftie, and appointeth out, into vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteouesnesse, (against the righteouesnesse whereof our nature as it is perverse & crooked, doeth alway strive, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe is weak & feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reprooueth vs both of weaknes & vnrighteouesnesse. Moreouer, that inward lawe which we haue before laid to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the hearts of al men, doth after a certaine maner enseeme vs of the same things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conscience doeth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling; but that it inwardly is a witness and admonisher of those things that we owe to God, and lyeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and to accurseth vs when wee swarde from our dutie. But man being wrapped in such darkenesse of errors as he is, sharke even slenderly taisteth by that lawe of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truely hee is verie farre distan from the right knowledge thereof. Befide that, he is so swollen with arrogan-
2. Nowe it is easie to understand what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our creator, so of right he hath the place of our father and Lorde, and that by this reason we owe to him glory, reverence, love and fear. Yea, and also that we are not at our own liberty, to follow whither we choose, but of our minde both move us, but that we are ought to hang upon his becke, and to rest only upon that which pleaseth him. Then wee learne, that he delighteth in righteousnesse, that he abominieth wickednesse, and therefore that whereas wee will with wicked vnthankfulnesse fall away from our creator, wee must necessarily obey righteousnesse all our life long. For if then onely wee yeld vnto him the reverence that wee owe, when wee preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worship of him, but the observation of righteousnesse, holy-nesse and cleannesse. Neither may wee pretend this excuse that wee want power, and like wasted debts be not able to pay. For it is not convenient that wee should measure the glory of God by our owne power: for whatsoever wee bee, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a lover of righteousnesse, a hater of wickednesse. Wheresoeuer he requireth of vs (because hee can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature wee must of necelitie obey: but that wee are not able, is our owne fault. For if wee bee holden bounde of our owne lust wherein sinne reigneth, so that we are not lose at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why wee should alledge necelitie for our defence, the euill whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our selves.

3. When wee haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the law, then must wee by the teaching of the same lawe also defeende vnto our selves: whereby at length we may carrie away two things. The first is, by comparing the righteousnesse of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore wee are not worthie to haue place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckoned among his children. The seconde is, in considering our strength, to learne that it is not onely insufficient to fulfill the lawe, but also utterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a distrust of our owne strength, and a care and fearefulness of minde. For conscience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the judgement of God is present before it: and the judgement of God cannot be felle, but that it striketh into vs a dreadful horror of death. And likewise being constrained with prooues of her owne weakenesse, it cannot choose but by and by fall into dispaire of her owne strength. Both these affections doe ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made afraine with feeling of eternal death, which hee feareth to hang over him by the persevering of his owne righteousness, turneth himselfe to the owne mercie of God, as to the owne haue of salvation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that hee oweth vnto the lawe, desparing in himselfe, hee may take take breath againe and beginne to craue and looke for helpe from else where.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reverence of his righteousnesse hath also added promises and threatenings to fill our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be mewed with the only beautie of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull Father of his tender kindnesse, to allure vs with sweetenesse of rewards to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewards laid vp for vertue, & that he shall not spend his labour in vaine, whosoever he be, that shall obey his commandements. He proclaimeth on the other side, that he not onely abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, but also that it shall not escape vnpunished, for that hee wil be a revenger of the contempt of his maiestie. And to exhort vs by all meanes, hee promiseth as well the blessings of this present life as also eternall blessednesse, to their obedience that keepe his commandements: & to the transgressors thereof, he threatneth both present miferies and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (hee that doth thes things that liue in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the foule that sinneth, that same shal die) do without doubt belong to the immortalitie or death that is to come, & shall neuer be ended. Albeit, whereforeuer is mentioned the good wil or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternall destruction. Of present blessings & curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penal ordinances appeareth the soueraigne cleannesse of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, besides his great loue of righteousness, (where he cannot finde in his heart to defraud of her rewarde) there is also proued by his maruellous bountifullnes. For wheras we & al ours are indented vnto his Maiestie, by good right what soever he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due det, but y payement of det is not worthie of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we do not yeld of our selues as things that were not due: but what those promises do bring vnto vs, is partly saide alreadie, & partly shal appear more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember & consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendation of righteousness, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleaseth God: that y penal ordinances are set for the more detestation of vnrighteousnes, leaft the sinner delited with the sweete flatterings of vices, should forget that the judgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Nowe whereas the Lorde giving a rule of perfect righteousness, hath applied all the partes thereof to his owne wil, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obediencie, which is so much more diligentely to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more readie to deceive now and then diverse sortes of worshipping to winne his favoure withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religio, because it is naturally planted in the witte of man, hath shewed and yet doeth shewe forth it selfe, that men do alwaye delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteousness beside the word of God, whereby it commendeth to passe that the commandements of the law have but small place among the works that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable route of mens works occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses than to restraine such licentiousnesse, when after the publishing of the lawe he spake thus to people:

Giue heed, & hear all the things that I commaunde thee, that it may be well to thee and to thy children after thee for ever, when thou shalt doe that which is good and pleasant before thy God. What I commaunde thee, that onely do: add not unto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protested, that this was his wisedome and understanding before other nations, that he had received judgements, righteounes & ceremonies of the Lord, he said further, Kepe therefore thy icle & thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes have seene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, because God did foresee, that the Israelties would not rest, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beside it travaile in bringing forth new righteounes, if they were not severely holden backe; therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteounes, which should have bin the strongest stay to hold them back, & yet they did not ceasse from that boldnesse so much forbidden them. But what of vs? wee are surely comprehended within the same charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath challenged to his law the absolute doctrine of righteounes, yet we not contented therewith, do monstrously travaile with forging & conyng of newe good worke one upon another. For the healing of this fault, the best remedie shalbe, if this thought shalbe stedfastly settled in vs, that the law is given vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteounes, that therein is taught no righteounes; but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore newe forms of worke are vainly attempted to winne the favour of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such stude of good worke as wandreth out of the law of God, is an intolle-erable desilliance of Gods righteounes & of the true righteounes.

The first rule for right understanding of the lawe is, that is required, not onely outward but inward holiness: which is pleasant unto him that noteth the difference betweene God and mortall lawmakers.

But when we have expounded the lawe of the Lorde, then more fitly and with more profitable shall that be confirmed which I haue before spoken of the office and vs of the law. But before that I beginne to discourse every several commandement by it selfe, it shalbe good now to give such lessons as ferue to the yeuvers fall knowledge thereof. First let vs holde for determined, that the life of man is instruected in law not onely to outward honesty, but also to inward & spiritual righteounes, which thing whereso no man can deny, yet there be few that rightly make it. That commeth to passe, because they look not upon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weied. If any king do by proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steale: in this case I grant that if a man doe only conceive in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steale, & do not commit any of these things in decede, hee is out of the compass of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortall lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuilitie: his commandments are not not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eye nothing escapeth, & which regardeth not so much the outward show as the cleanness of the heart) under the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter & theft, forbidden lust, wrath, hatred, coveting of another man's, guile, & whatsoever is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spiritual lawmaker, he speaketh no lesse to the soul than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soul, are wrath & hatred: the theft of the soul, is evil desire & covetousness: the fornication of the soul, is lust. But man's laws also (will some man say) have regard to intents & wills, & not to successess of fortune. I grant, but yet are they such intents & wills, as have outwardly broken out. They were with what intent every outward act hath been done, but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his hands from offending. On the other side, because the heavenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of minds is principally needfull to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, even when they mightily dissemble there contempt of the law, doe frame their eyes, their fette, their hands, and all the partes of their bodies to some observation of the law, in the meantime they holde their heart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselfes well discharged, if they keepe close from men that they do in the sight of God. They heare it faide: thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adultery: Thou shalt not steele: they drawe not out their sworde to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlottes: they lay not their hands vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole heartes they breath out murders, they boyle in lust, they caft their eyes aside at all mens goods, and deuour them with coueting. Nowe wanteth that which was the cheefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so groffe dulleesse, but that leauing the law-maker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their owne wit? Against these doeth Paul mightily cry out, affirming that the lawe is spirituall, whereby he meaneth, that it is not onely, demanded an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angellike purenesse, which hauing all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may savour nothing but of the spirite.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the law, wee thrust not in a newe exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expistor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion that he performeth the lawe that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, he reproueth this most perilous error, and pronounced that vnchaft looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslaughterers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guilty of judgement that haue but conceived wrath in their mind, and them guilty of the counsel that in murmuring or grudging haue vittered any token of a displeased minde: and them guilty of Hell fire, that with tauntes and railing break forth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue fayned Christ to be an other Moses, the giver of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection of the lawe of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospell, which farre pasteth

paffeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commaundemente$^1$, it shall appeare by Mofes himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonour the law of God. Truely it seeth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hy-pocrisie, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righte-oufnesse. But it is verie eafe to confute that error: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the law, whereas he did but restore the law to her integritie, while he made it free, and clenfeth it being obscured with lies, & defiled with leauen of the Pharifes.

8 Let this bee our seconde note, that there is alway more conteined in the commaundemente$^1$s and prohibitions, than is by wordes expressed, which yet is so to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentious ly wrting the Scriptures, wee may make of every thing what wee lift. For many bring to passe by this vnmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authoritie of Scripture growth in contempt, and other则some despeire of understanding it. Therefore if it bee possible, wee must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, wee must I say search howe farre our exposition may exceede the bounds of the wordes, that it may appeare that it is not an addition of mens glofes knit to the worde of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the lawegius is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commaundemente$^1$s it is so manifstart, that there are figurative spea-ches, meaning more in expressing part that hee may worthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober exposition doeth passe beyond the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth harde to judge, vnlesse there bee some measure appointed: wherefore I thinketh this to be the best measure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commaundement, that is, that in every commaundement be wyeed, why it was gien vs. As for example:

Every commaundement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding:

the trueth of both fortes shall forswaile with bee founde, if wee consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the end of the fifth commaundement is, that honour is to be gien to them to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commaundement, that it is right and pleafeth

God, that wee honour them to whom he hath gien any excellencie, & that hee abhorreth contempt and ftubbornenesse against them. The intent of the first commaundement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commaundement shall bee, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worshippe of his maiestie pleafeth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euerie commaundement wee must looke vpon what matter it treateth: then muft wee search out the ende, till wee finde what the lawmaker doeth teftifie therein properly to pleafe or displease him: and last of all muft wee drawe an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleafeth God, then the contrarie displeafeth him:

if this displease him, then the contrarie pleafeth him: if hee command this, then he forbidden the contrarie, if hee forbid this, then he commandeth the contrarie.

That which is now some what darkly touched, shall in expounding of the commandments become very plain by practice, wherefore it sufficeth to have touched it, sauing that this last point, is to be shortly confirmed with some proofe thereof, because otherwife either it should be not be understanded, or being understanded, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurditie. This needeth no proofe, that when a good thing is commanded, the euils is forbidden that is contrarie to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it mee. And common judgement will not much sticke to admit, that when euils things are forbidden, the contrarie duties are commanded. It is an uniuserial opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrarie vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those forms of speach do signify commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrarie to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it procedeth farther, that is to contrarie duties and doinges. Therefore in this commandement, Thou shalt not kill, the common sense of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to do hurt. I say that there is further contained, that we should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I proue it thus: God forbidde that our brother be hurt or misused, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deare and precious vs to do: he doth therefore require with all those duties of love that may be done by vs for the preservation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commandement doth alway disclose vs to all that we are therein commanded or forbidden to do.

But why God in such as it were halfe commandements, hath by figures rather secretly signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me about the rest. Becaue the flesh alway endeuoureth to extenuate the filthines of sin, & to colour it with faire pretences, sauing where it is euens palpable for grossenes, he hath fet forth for an example in euerie kind of offence that which was most wicked & abominable, at the hearing whereof our vertue senses might be moved with horror, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more haynous detestinge of euerie sort of sinne. This many times deceueth vs in woying of vices, that if they be any thing secret, wee make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when hee accustometh vs to referre al the whole multitude of vices to these principal heads, which do best of all shew, how much every kind is abominable. As for example, wrath & hatred are not thought of haynous euils, when they are called by their owne names, but when they are forbidden vs under the name of manslaughter, wee better understand how abominable they are before god, by whole word they are set in the degree of abhorrence of an offence; and wee moverd by his judgement, do accustome our felues better to weigh the haynousnes of those faults that before seemed but light vs.

Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the law of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will judge that there is some time mention made not vnto from the purpose, nor without cause. And wee have a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this
this matter. For God so deuized his law into two partes, in which is con-\nained the whole righteousnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the dutie\ny of religion that do peculiarly pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead,\nthe other to the dutie of Charity, which belong vnto men. The first foun-\ndation of righteousness is the worship of God: which being once overthowe,\nall the other members of righteousness are torned in sunder and disfolued,\nlke to the partes of an houle vnioinointed and fallen downe. For what maner\nof righteousness wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robbery &\nextractions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoylest Gods\nmaiesty of his glory? that thou defeastro thy bodie with fornication, if\nwith thy blaspheemies thou prophanely abufe the sacred name of God? that\nthou murderest no man, if thou travaile to destroy and extinguish the me-\nmorie of God. Wherefore righteousness is vaine boast of without reli-\ngion, and maketh no better showe, than if a mangled body with the head cut\noff, should be brought forth for a beautiful sight. And religion is not only the principal part of righteousness, but also the vrie soule wherewith it\nbreatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie & loue among them-\nselves without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God\nis the beginning & foundation of righteousness, because when it is taken\naway, all the equitie, continence and temperance that men vse among the-selves, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the springhead\nand lively breath of righteousness, because hereby men doe learne to liue\namong themselves temperately and without hurt doing one to another, if\nthey reverence God as the judge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the fift\ntable he instructeth vs to godlineffe & the proper dutie of religion, wherewith his maiesty is to be worshipped: in the other he prescribeth howe for\nthe feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selves in the fellowship\nof men. And for this reason our Lorde (as the Evangellists rehearse it) did\nin a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall pointes, the one that\nwee should loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our\nstrengthe: the other, that wee loue our neighbour as our selves. Thus thou\nseest howe of the two partes wherein he concludeth the whole lawe, he di-recteth the one towarde God, and appointeth the other toward men.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principal points,\nyet, to the ende to take awaie all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God, to\ndeclare in the ten commandements more largely & plainly all things that\nbelong both to the honor, feare & loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie\nwhich he commandeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is\nnot ilspent to knowe the diuision of the commandements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein every man ought to have his judgment free, for which we ought not contentiously to strive with him that\nthinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, leaft the readers\nshould either scorne or maruell at the diuision that we shall vse, as new and\nlately deuised. That the law is deuided in ten words, because it is oft approved by the authority of God himselfe, it is out of controversy, wherefore\nthere is no doubt of the number, but of the maner of diuiding. They that do\ndiuide them, that they give three commandements to the fift table, & put\nother other 7. into the second, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it under the first: whereas without doubt it is severally set by the Lord for a commandement, & the tenth commandement of not coveting the things of his neighbour, they doe fondly resolve into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to understand, that such manner of dividing was unknown in the purer age. Other do reckon, as we do, foure severall commandemtbes in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promife without the commandement. As for me, because vnlesse I be convinced by evident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandementes, me thinks I see so many divided in very fit order. Therefore, leaving to them their opinion, I wil follow that which I best allowe, that is, that the same which these later part make the first commandement, shall be in stead of a preface to the whole lawe, and then shall followe the commandementes, foure of the first table, and seinte of the second, in such order as they shalbe rehearsed. Augustine alio to Boniface agreeeth with vs, which in rehearsing them keepe that order: that God only be served with obedience of religion, that no idol be worshipped, that the name of the Lorde be not taken in vaine, when hee had before severally spoken of the shadowish commandement of the Sabbath. In another place in deede that first diuision pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandementes, the mysterie of the Trinitie more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place hee sticketh not to confesse that otherwise hee rather liketh our diuision. Besides these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vppon Matthew is of our side. Josephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, affigneth to either table five commandementes. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charity, and alio is confuted by the authoritie of the Lorde himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the commandement of honouring our parentes, in the number of the second table. Nowe let us heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a parte of the first commende-, or reade it severally, it is indifferent vnto mee, so that you do not denie mee that it standeth in stead of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heed to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all proviseth, that the majestie of the lawe that he shall make, may never at any time come in contempt. For establishing whereof he vseth three maner of arguments. First he chalengeth to himselfe power & right of dominion, whereby he may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then he setteth forth a promise of grace with sweetnes thereof to allure the to study of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefite that he did for them, to reproce the Iewes of va-
Cap. 8, Of the knowledge of thankfulnes, if they do not with obedience answer his kindnes. Under the name of Jehovah, the Lord, is meant his authoritative & lawful dominion. And if all things be of him & doe abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought under the yoke of God's majesty, because it were monstrous for vs to seek to withdraw vs felues from under his government, out of whom we cannot be.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to draw by only necessitie, he also allureth with sweetenesse in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutual relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. Whereupon Christ proueth that Abraham, Isaac & Jacob have immortal life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I have chosen you to be my people, not only to do you good in this present life, but also to give you the blessednesse of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in diverse places in the lawe. For when the Lord doeth yuachafe to deal thus mercifully with vs, to call vs into the company of his people, he chose vs for his law, that we should be a peculiar people unto himself, a holy people, and should keepe his commandements, From whence also commeth this exhortatio: Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is derived that protestation that is in the Prophet: The sonne honoureth the father, and the servant honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my scare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

15 Now followeth the rehearsal of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to move vs, as the fault of vnhankfulnes is more detestable even among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof being worthy to be had in remembrance for ever, should remaine in force with their posteritie. Moreover it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say that they were delivered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, they should with obedience & readines of service honour him, the author of their deliverance. He vseth also, (to the end to hold vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himself with certain titles, whereby he maketh his sacred majesty to be differently known from all idols & forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our ready inclination to vanitie, joyned with rash boldnesse, so soone as God is named, our mind cannot take heed to it itselfe, but that it by and by falleth away to some vaine invention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedie for this mishiefe, he setteth out his own godhead with certain titles & dooth compasse vs in, as it were within certaine grates, lest we should wander hither & thither & rashly forge our felues some new God, if forsaking the living God, we should erect an idol. For this cause, so oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they cloth him, & as it were enclose him, within those marks, whereby he had opened himself to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when he is set in the temple of Hierusalem.
Wherefore heareth hee hath preeminded the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commandement, That we have no strange Gods before him. The ende of this commandement is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholly enjoy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may fo be, he commandeth that there be farre from vs all vngodliness & superstition, whereby the glorie of his godhead is either diminished or obscured; and by the same reason he commandeth, that we worship & honor him with true endeavour of godlines. And the very simplicitie of the words themselfes do in a manner expresse the same. For we cannot haue God, but we must also comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we should not gie away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly may they be brought vnto four principal points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioyned spiritual obedience of conscience: Affiance, Invocation, & Thanksgiving. Adoration I call the reverence & worship which every one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when hee submitteth himselfe vnto his greatness: Wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part thereof, that we yield our consciences in subjectio to his law. Affiance is an assurednes of resting in him by reknowing of his powers, when reposeing all wisdome, righteousnes, power, truth and goodnes in him, we thinke

our felues blessed with only partaking of him. Invocation, is a refroring of our minde to his faith and helpe as to our onely succour, so oft as any necessary prelent vs. Thankesgiving is a certaine thankfulness whereby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God suffereth nothing to be conuoyed away else where, so he commaunded all to be wholy giuen to himselfe. Neither shall it be enough to abstaine from having any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy selfe in this, that many wicked contemners are wont, which thinke thereadiest waye, to scorne all religions: but true religion must goo before, whereby our mindes may be directed to the living God, with knowledge whereof they being endued may aspire to reverence, feare and worship his maisterie, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, every where to seeke for his helpe, to reknowledge and advance with confession of praise the magnificence of his workes, as to the onely marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swauring from the true God, are drawn hither and thither as it were vnto divers gods. Wherefore, if wee bee contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before said, that all forged gods are to be druen farre away, & that the worship is not to be torne in sunder, which hee alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glory, be it noer so little, but that all things that belong to him may wholy remayne with him. The parcel of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hai-nousnes: for that God is provoked to jealouzie, so oft as wee thrust our own inventions in his place, as if an vnchast woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes should the more vexe his mind. Therefore when God testified that with his present power and grace hee looked upon the people that he had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked aft of falling from him, hee giueth them warning that there can bee no new gods brought in, but that he is witness & beholder of their faeritle. For this boldnesse is encreaseth with much wickednes, that man thinketh that in his flyings away he can beguile the eyes of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer we purpose, what soeuer wee go about, whatsoeuer we practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience bee cleane euon from the most secret thoughts of swauring from him, if wee will have our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to have the glory of his godhead whole and uncorrupted not onely in outward confessio, but also in his eyes, which do behold the most secret corners of hearts.

The ende of the second commandement being to keep the vworship of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddenst first to make any image for representation of God, & secondly to vworship any image made.

The second Commandement.

Thou shalt not make to thee any grauen image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heauen above, or in earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serve them.

17 As in the first commandement he pronounced that he is the one God beside whome there are no other gods to be deuised or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kind of worship he is to be honoured: that wee may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The ende therefore of this commandement is, that hee will not haue have the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vfrages. Wherefore in summe, lie calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall observations, which our foolish minde is wont to inuente, when it conceiueh God according to her owne grossenesse. And therefore hee frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worship, and which is appointed by him. Hee speakeh of the groffest fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there be two partes of this commandement.
The first refraineth our libertie, that we do not presume to make subject to our senses or by any forme to represent God, which is incomprehensible.
The second part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions sake.
Moreover he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophan & superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, & peraduenture also birds, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomie he meaneth as well birds as starres. Which note I would not have spoken of but that I sawe some unskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other partes, because they are sufficiently known of themselues.
And we haue alreadie in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible forms of God man doth invent, they are directly contrarie to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come forth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penall ordinance followeth ought not a little to auaille to shake off our slouthfulness. For he threateneth: That he is the Lorde our God, a strong & ielous God, that visiteth the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and sweth mercie vnto thousandes to them that love him and keepe his com-mandements. This is as much in effect, as if he should haue said, that it is he only vpon whom we ought to stick. And to bring vs thereunto, he speakeh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contem-ned or diminished. Here is in deede set the name El, which signifieth God, but because it is derived of strength, to expresse the better, I did not stick so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himself ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he wil be a ruen-gers of his majestie & glorie if any do transferre it to creatures or to grauen images, & that not with a short or slender ruenge, but such as shall extend to the children & childrens children, & childrens childrens children, that is such as shalbe followers of their fathers vngodlinesse: as also he sweth a perpetuall mercie & bountifullnesse vnto long continuance of posterite, to thos that love him & keepe his lawe. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the conjunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiueh vs into the bo-some of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stande by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the duties of a faithfull & true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such love and chaftitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeld e not our soules to Satan, to lust, & to filthie desere of the fleth, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostase of the Jewes, complaineth that they did throwe away chaftitie, and
Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and raft that he himself is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wives minds entwine to a strange lover: so the Lord that hath wedded vs into himself in truth, testifieth that he hath a most fervently burning chuzzle, so oft as neglecting the pureness of his holy marriage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transferre to any other, or do inspect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to bee most vncorrupted: Forasmuch as by this meane we do not only brake the faith given in wedlocke, but also to defile the vertue wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be scene what he meaneth by this, when he faith, that he will visite the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with y equi-tie of Gods iustice, to punish the innocent for an others offence, God him selfe also faith, that he will not make the sonne to beare the wickednesse of the father. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sinnes of the ancestors vpon the generation to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that renderest the inquity of the fathers to the children, vnto the third and fourth generation.
Likewise Hieremie: Thou that wouldest mercie in thousandes, that renderest the iniquitie of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them. Manie, while they travaile much in losing this knot, thinke that it is to be understanded only of temporal punishments, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurditie, forasmuch as they are oftentimes laid vpon them for their saluation, which is in deedde true. For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonnes should be spoiled of the kingdom, & carried into exile for the sinne that he had committed. The houses of Pharzo & Abimeleth were plagued for offending Abrahan. But when that is alleged for affoilng of this question, it is rather a shipp than a true exposition. For here & in like places he threatneth a more greeuous reuenge than that it may be limitted within the boundes of this present life. It is therefore thus to be raten: that the iust curse of the Lord, lieth not only vpon the head of y wicked man him self, but also vpon his whole familie: when the curse once lieth vpon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, live most wickedly, & the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, do follow the same way of destruction: and finally the childe and the child of the childe child, the cursed seede of destitable men do fall headlong after them?

20 First let vs see whether such reuenge be vnseemely for the iustice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lorde vouchesfeth not to communicate his grace. Neuerthelesse they do perish by their own vnrighteousnes, & not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarell, Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to saluation as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laide vpon wicked men & euill doers for their offences, that their houses are deprived of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuse God for this most iust reuenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounce, that the punishment of the fathers sin shall not pass over vnto the sonne. Note what is there intreated of. Wha the Is-raellites had bin long & continually vexed with manie calamities, they began to vs for a Proverb, that their fathers had eated a lower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge where by they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they being also righteous, & not deserving it did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeasable wrathful-ness of God, than by a moderate feueritie. The Prophet pronounce them to that it is not so: because they are punished for their own offences, and that it standeth not with the justice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away for the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth & other helps of salvation: in this that the children being blinded & forsaken of him, doe goe on in the steps of their fathers, they sustaine cures for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, & at last to eternal destruction, herein they are punished by the just judgement of God, not for sinnes of other, but for their own iniquitie.

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemn covenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hauing respect vnto, writteth that the children of the righteous shal be blessed after their death, not only by reason of holy bringing vp, which also not a little advantage therevnto, but also for that blessing promised in the covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon growth great comfort to the faithful, great terrour to the wicked. For if even after death, the remembrance both of righteousnes & wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoun-deth vnto posteritie, much more shall it light and rest upon the heads of the doers themselves. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wickded many times commeth to good proofs, & the issue of the faithful swar-ueth out of kinde: becau se the lawmaker meant not here to stablisy such a perpetual rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terrour of the sinner, that the penal tye is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For as the temporal punishments that are laid vp to a fewe wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the judgement that shall one day be given vpon al sinners, although many escape unpunished euen to the end of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifullnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a proofe of his constant and perpetuall favour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, hee sheweth what judgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences.
Which assurednesse he had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largenesse of his mercie, which hee

The promise of mercy towards them & theirs that feare God, breedeth comfort, is not contraried by their issues, swaunte sometimes out of kind, & it steetch out the largenesse of his mercie to exceede the regour of his suflicie.

Pro.20.7
The end of this commandement is, that his will is to have the majesty of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the summe shall be that wee do not defile it with contemptuously and irreverently vsing it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that we take studie and care godlily to reverence it. Therefore wee ought so to order our foules both in our mindes and our tongues, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but reverently and with much sobriety: that in weyng his workes, wee conceive nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that whatsoever our minde conceiue of him, whatsoever our tongue uttereth, it may fauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnes of his name: and finally may serue to aduantage his magnificence. That we do not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy worde and reverence mysteries either to ambition, or to courteoufesse, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may kepe their honour and estimation among vs. Last of all, that wee doe not carpe against or speake cuill of his workes, as these wretched men are wont to babble reproachfully against them: but that whatsoever wee reheare done by him, we report it with words of prais of his wedesone, righteoufnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwife is done, it is defiled with vaine and peruerse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right vs whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be too much cuill in this rash readinesse to vs the name of God out of season, much more mischiefe is in this, if it be employed to cuill vses, as they doe that make it to serve the superstitions of Necromancie, cruel excercasions, unlawful conjurations, and other wicked enchantements. But swearing is chiefly mentioned in the commandement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby wee may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandement given of the worshop of God, and of the reverence of his name, and not of the trueth and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he afterwarde in the second table condemneth periuie and false witnesse, whereby hurt is done to the fellowship of men; but it were in vaine to repeate it againe, if this commandement intreated of the dutie of charitie. And also the diuision of the lawe it selfe requirith it, because as it is saide, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holinesse of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

First it is to be learned what is an oath. It is a taking of God to witness to confirm the truth of that which we speak. For those cursed speaches that conteine manifest reproches against God, are unworthie to be reckned among othes. That such taking to witness, when it is rightly done, is a kinde of worshipping of God, is shewed in due se places of the Scripture. As when Esay prophesie of the calling of the Assyrians and Egyptians into fellowship of the covenante with Israel, They shal speake(faith he) in the tongue of Canaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lord. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shal yeeld a confession of his religion. Againe, when he speaketh of the enlargement of his kongdome, he faith: Whosoever shall bleffe himselfe, shall bleffe in the God of the faithful: and he that shall sweare in the land shall sweare in the true God. Jerome faith, if they shal teach many people to sweare in my name as they haue taught them to sweare by Bala, they shalbe builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is said, that when we call vp the name of the Lorde to witness, we do witness our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall & vnchangeable trueth, whom we call vp, not onely as a most substantial witness of trueth above all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of hearts. For where testimonies of men do faile, there we flee to God for witness specially where any thing is to be proued that lieth secrete in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angry with them that sweare by strange gods, & he judgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue forsaken me, & do sweare by them that are no gods. And he declareth the hainous sills of this offence by threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of the Lord, & sweare by Melchian.

Now then, when we understand that it is the Lords will that there bee in our othes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent heede is to bee taken, that in stead of worshipping they doe not conteine dishonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no small dishonor, when perieurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lorde when he is spoiled of his trueth? he shall then ceasse to be God. But truly he is spoiled thereof, when he is made an affirmer & approver of fallhood. Wherefore, when Josia minded to drue Achan to confesse the trueth, he said: My sonne, give glorie to the Lorde of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lorde is grievously dishonoured in a man sweare falsly by him. And no maruel. For we do as much as in vs lieth, in a manner, to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speach was vsed among the lewes so oft as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospel of John. To this heedfulness the forms of othes that are vset in Scriptures doe instruct vs: The Lord liueth, The Lord do these things into me, and add these things, The Lord be witnessse vpon my soule, Which do proue, that we cannot call God for witnessse of our sayings, but that wee also with him to take vengeance of our perieurie, if we speake deceitfully.

superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsely, ynlesse we do also remember, that swearing was suffered and ordained not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they go beyond the lawfull vse thereof, that apply it to things not necessarie. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serve either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offend, and so much the more intolerably, for that by verie custome it hath casual to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the judgement scate of God is not slanderly weyed. For every where without regarde, the name of God is defiled in trifling takes, and it is not thought that they doe evil, because by long suffered and unpunished boldneffe, they are come to rest as it were in profession of so great wickednesse. But the commandement of the Lorde remaineth in force, the penaltie abode in strength, & shall one day have his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall revenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commandement is also transgressed in an other point, that in our othes we put the holy servants of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodliness, for so we transfere the glorie of his godhead to them. Neither is it without cause that the Lorde hath given a special commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that wee shoulde not be heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing do call vpon a higher than themselves, & that God which had none greater than his owne glorie to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, do detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto you, sweare not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoever is more than this, is of evill. But by this meanes, they do without consideration flumbe against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his father, and as if he had come downe from heaven to repeale his fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the lawe permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were ymough: but also in necessitie doeth comiande it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father: that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commaunded him; his doctrie is not of himselfe, &c. What then will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterward forbide and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commaunding it? But because there is some difficultie in the wordes of Christ, let vs a little weigh them. But herein wee shal never attaine the trueth, vnlesse wee bend our eyes vnto the intent of Christ, and take heed vnto the purpose that hee there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restraine the law, but to reduce it to the true and natural understanding, which had beene very much depraied by the false gloses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if wee hold in minde, wee shal not thinke that Christ did utterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which do transgresse the rule of the law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no manner of swearing.

swearing but periuries, whereas the law doth not only forbid periuries, but also all idle & superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most pure expeditor of the law, doth admonish them, that it is not only evil to forswear, but also to sweare. But howe to sweare? in vaine. But as for these othes that are commended in the law, he leaveth them safe and at libertie. They seeme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest hold of this worde at all, which yet is not referred to the word Sweare, but to forms of swearing that are after rehearsed. For this was also part of their error, that when they did sweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principal kinde of offence against this commandement, the Lorde doeth also cut off from them all by this fees that they should not thinke that they haue escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witnesse. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect forms doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the lyuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme or other tokens of gods liberalitie towards them. Neither doeth Christ in that place where hee forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierufalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophisticall suttletic, which thought it no fault babblingly to throw out indirect othes, as though they feared the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benves. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie devisid that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the king: for then the false making of Gods doth obscure & minish the glorie of the one onely God. But when wee meanely, to procure credite to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his majestie is offended.

Christ taketh from this licentiousnesse, all pretense of excuse, in this that hee forbiddeth to sweare at all. And Iaues to the same purpose, reciting the same wordes of Christ which I haue before alledged, because the same rash boldnesse hath always beene in the worlde, which is a prophane misusing of the name of GOD. For if yee referre this word, At all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether unlawful to sweare: wherefore scruch that exposition which is added afterweare: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those caulations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

Therefore it cannot nowe be doubtfull to founde judgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprooue those othes that were forbidden by the lawe. For he himselfe which chewed in his life an exampler of the perfection that he taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his discipels, who (wee doubt not) did obey their master in all things, followed the same example: who dare saye that Paul would haue sweorne, if swearing had bene vterely forbidden? But when the matter so required, he sweare without any stickeing at it, yea, sometime adding an exclamation. But this question is not yet ended, because some do thinke that only publike othes are excepted out of this prohibition; as those othes that wee take when the Magistrate doeth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vse to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the Souliar when he is put to an othe for his true seruice in the warre, and such like. And to this fort they adioyne, and that rightfully, such othes as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Gospel, for as much as the Apostles in their office are not private men but publike ministers of God. And truly I denie not that those are the safest othes, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commanded in a doubtful case to drive the witnesse to an othe, and he on the other side to answeare by othe: and the Apostle faith, that mens controversies are by this mean ended. In this commandement both these have a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and wee may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publike and sollemne othe was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were usually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or verie little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the majestie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemne private othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holily, & reuerently taken, which are maintained both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for private men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as judge between them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put thy cafe: thy brother will accuse thee of faules breach of faith, thou endeoureft to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and he by no meanes will suffer him selfe to be satisfied. If thy good name come in peril by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the judgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie known. Nowe if the weight of the wordes be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case wee should affirme, that the calling him to witnesse is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaack with Abimelech be saide to serue for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Iacob and Laban were private men, which stablished a coenuant with mutuall othe betwene themselues. Booz was a private man which by the same meanes confirmed his promise of mariage to Ruth. Abdiad was a private man, a just man and fearing God, which affirmed vnto Elias by oth, the thing that he meant to perswade him. Therefore I have no better rule, but that othes be so tempered, that they be not vnadvised, that they be not common without regarde, that they be not vned of raging lust, nor trifling, but that they serue just necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Sabbas day. Sixe daies shalt thou worke, & doe all thy workes. But on the seventh day is the Sabbas of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no worke, &c.
28 The end of this commandement is, that we being dead to our own affections and works, shou'd be buried in meditation of the kingdom of God, and to the same meditation should be exercized, by such meanes as he hath ordained. But because this commandement hath a peculiar and several consideration from the rest, therefore it must have also a seueral manner of exposition. The olde writers use to call it a shadow with commandement, for that it containeth the outward obseruation of the day, which by the coming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I grant they say truely, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore wee must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I thinke) I have marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandement confisteth. For first the heavenly lawmaker meant under the rest of the seventh day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spiritual rest, where-bly the faithfull ought to cease from their own works, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondly, his will was to have one appointed day, wherein they should meete together to heare the lawe, and execute the ceremonies; or at least bestowe it peculiarly to the meditation of his worke: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlines.
Thirdly, he thought good to have a day of rest granted to seruants, & such as lived under the government of other, wherein they might have some ceasing from their labour.

29 But we are many wayes taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principal point in the Sabbat. For the Lorde required the keeping of no commandement in a manner more severely, than this; when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is overthrown, then he complaineth that his Sabbates are polluted, defiled, not kept, not sanctified: as though that piece of service being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honoured. He did set forth the observing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithfull did among other o-xacles maruellously esteem the receiving of the Sabbat. For in Nehemiah thus spake the Leuites in a solemn convocation, Thou haft shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbat, & haft guien them the commandements and the ceremonies; and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commandements of the lawe. All which things doe serve to set forth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus, See that yee kepe my Sabbat day, because it is a token betwenee mee and you in your generations: that you may knowe that I am the Lorde that sanctifie you: kepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel kepe the Sabbat and celebrate it in their generations, it is an everlasting covenante betwenee me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should knowe that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our own will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne will, wee must resigne vp our heart, wee must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our own wit, that we may have God working in vs, that we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

30. This perpetuall ceasing was represented to the Jews, by the keeping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be observed with greater devoition, the Lord commanded with his owne example. For it availleth not a little to stirre vp mans endeavour, that hee may knowe that hee tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifye everlast-ning continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of dayes and nightes. There may be also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shewe that the Sabbat should never be perfectly ended, til it came to the last day. For in it we beginne our blessed rest, in it we do daily proceed in professing more and more. But because we haue still a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntil that saying of Esaie be fulfilled, concerning the contin-ing of newe Moone with newe Moone, of Sabbath with Sabbath, even then when God shalbe all in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the seuenthe day fet forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbat at the last day, that our whole life might by continuall meditation of the Sabbat, aspire to this perfection.

31. If any man dislike this observation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that hee may more simply take it, that the Lord ordained one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the lawe be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spiritual rest: And that he assigned the seuenthe day, either because he thought it suficient, or that by setting foorth the likenesse of his own example, he might the better move the people to keepe it or at least to put them in mind, that the Sabbat tended to no other end, but that they should become like unto their creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysterie remaine which is therein principally set forth, concerning the perpetuall rest of our workes, to consideracion whereof of the Prophets did now and then call back the Jewes, that they should not thinke themselves discarged by carnall taking of their rest. Beside the places already alledged, you haue thus in Esaie: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbath, that thou do not thine owne will in my holy day, and shall call the Sabbath delicate and holy of the gloriuous Lord, and shalt glorifie him while thou dost not thine owne wayes, & seekest not thine owne will to speake the worde, then shalt thou be delited in the Lord &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. (For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures do vanish away, he is the bodie at sight whereof the shadowes are left, he, saies, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbath, wee being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, we may walke in newnes of life. Therefore in another place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbath was a shadow of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the per-perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared, that is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, until that we being utterly dead to our selves, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious observing of dayes ought to be farre from Christians.

32 But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to be reckoned among the olde shadowes, but do belong allke to all ages: since the Sabbat is abrogate, yet this hath still place with vs, that wee should meete at appointed dayes to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mystical bread, and to publike prayers: and then that to servants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commaunding the Sabbat, the Lorde had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely vse of the Iews to proue it. The seconder Moses spoke in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man servant and thy maide servant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Egypt. Again, in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Ass may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breaketh. Who can deny that both these things doe serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commaunded vs by the worde of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knowne in the verie experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed: and have their ordinarie dayes, howe can they bee kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it off, that comlineffe and order can bee kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hande present trouble and ruine of the church, & it be dissolued. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releasf whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbat to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to provide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt saye, why do wee not rather daily meeete together, that the difference of dayes may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truly spiritual wise done was a thing woorthie to haue daily a piece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakenesse of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see layde vpon vs by the will of God?

33 I am compelleth here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirites do raise trouble, concerning the sunday. They cry out that the Christian people are nourished in Lewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of dayes. But I answere, that we keepe those dayes without any Lewishnesse, because we do in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For wee keepe it not with strait religion as a ceremonie, wherein we think a spiritual mystere to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessarie remeedy to the keeping of order in the church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be judged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galatians, because they did still obserue dayes. And to the Remaines hee affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betweene daye and

and day. But who, saying these madde men onely doth not see, of what obseruing the Apostle meaneth? For they had no regard to this political ende and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them still as shadowes of spirituall things, they did even so much darken the glorie of Christ & the light of the Gospel. They did not therefore cease from handie workes, because they were things that did call them away from holy studies and meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from worke they did dreame that they still kept their mysteries of old time deliered them. The Apostle, I say, inuict against this disordered difference of dayes, and not against the lawfull choice of dayes that serveth for the quietnesse of Christian fellowship, for in the Churches that he himselfe did ordaine, the Sabbat was kept to this vse. For hee appointeth the Corinthishe the same daye, wherein they should gather the collection to releue the brethren at Jerusalem. If they feare superstition, there was more danger thereof in the feast dayes of the Iewes, than in the Sundayes that the Christians nowe haue. For so as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of superstition, the day that the Iewes religiously obferued is taken away: and, so as was necessarie for keeping of comlineffe, order, and quiet in the Church, an other day was appointed for the same vse.

34 Albeit the old fathers haue not without reason of their choue, put in place of the Sabbat daye, the day that wee call Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the Lord is the ende and fullfilling of that rest, whereof the old Sabbat was a shadowe: the Christians are by the verie same day made an ende of shadowes, put in minde that they should no longer stick into the shadowish ceremonie. But yet I do not so rest vpô the number of seuen, that I would binde the church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that haue other solemn dayes for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applied to the obseruation of Discipline and wel appointed order. Let the summe hereof be this: as the true was given to the Iewes under a figure, so it delivered vs without any shadowes at all. First, that in all our life long wee should be in meditation of a continuall Sabbat or rest from our owne workes, that the Lord may worke in vs by his spirite: then that every man privately so oft as he hath leasure, should diligently exercise himselfe in godly calling to minde the workes of God, and also, that we al should keep the lawful order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the worde, for the ministration of the Sacraments and for publike prayer: thirde, that wee should not vngently oppresse them that vnder vs and do the triflings of the false prophets vanishe away that in the ages past haue infected the people with a Jewish opinion, that so much as was ceremonially in this commandement is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the seventh day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproche of the Iewes to change the day, and to keeppe still the same holinesse in their mind. For there full remaineth with vs the like signification of mystery in the dayes as was among the Iewes. And truely we see what good they have done by such doctrine. For they that cleaue to their constitutions, doe by these these as much exceed as the Jews in grosse and carnal superstitition of Sabbath: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, do no lesse suffer for the

The fifth Commandement.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou mayst live long upon the Lande which the Lord thy God shall give thee.

35. The end of this Commandement is, that because the Lord doth delight in the preservation of his order, therefore he will that those degrees of preeminence which he hath ordained be not broken, the summe therefore shall be that we reverence those whom the Lord hath set ouer vs, that we yield to them honour, obedience and thankfulness. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden to withdrawe any thing from their dignity, either by contempt or obstinacie or vnthankfulness. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie verie largely: as when the Apostle sayeth, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not only that reverence is due unto them, but also such recompence as their ministratie deferueth. And because this commandement of subiection doth most of all disagree with the prerogatifs of mans nature, which as it swelleth with greedinesse of climbing high, so it hardely abideth to be brought lowe: therefore he hath set that kind of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable & least envious; because he might the easiely mcke ten and reclaime our minde to the vs of submission. Therefore the Lord doth by little and little traine vs to all lawfull subiection by that which is most easie to beare, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom hee giueth any preeminence, hee doth communicate his owne name with them, so far as is necessarie to preserve the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, do belong vnfole him alone, that so oft as wee heare one of them named, our minde must needs be touched with a feeling of his majestie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these things, he maketh to glitter with a certaine spark of his brightnesse, that they may be honorable every one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we have to consider somwhat of the nature of God, because he beareth not the name of God without cause. Hee that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

36 Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a general rule, that as we knowe any man to be by his ordinance set ouer vs, so we yeeld vnto him reverence, obedience, thankfulness, & such other duties as it lieth in vs to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or vnworthie. For of what sort soeuer they bee, they haue not without the providence of God attained that place, by reason whereof the lawmaker would haue them to be honored. Yet namely he hath given commandement of reverence to parents, that haue brought vs into this life, to which reverence reverence very nature ought in a manner to instruct vs. For they are monsters and not men, that break the authority of parents with dishonour or stubbornnesse. Therefore the Lord commanded all the disobedient to their parents, to be slain, as men vnworthie to enjoy the benefit of light, that doe not reknowledge by whose meane they came into it. And by manie additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we have noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reverence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lorde establisheth when he commandeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he puniseth the contempt and dishonour of them. The second hee confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that sayeing of Christ in the fiftenth of Matthew, that it is the commadment of God that we do good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, hee expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in mind, how acceptable vnto God is the submission, y is here commanded. For Paul calleth the same pricke to stirre vp our dulleffe when he speaketh of the first commandement with promise. For the promise that went before in the fift Table, was not special & properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole lawe. Nowe this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites particularly of the lande which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of lande was a pledge of Gods bountifulnesse: let vs not maruely if it pleased God to declare his favour by giving length of life, by which a man might long enjoy his benet. The meaning therefore is thus: Honor thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayest enjoy your possession of that lande that shall be vnto thee for a testimonie of my favour. But that all the earth is blessed to the faithful, wee doe worthily reckon this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doeth likewise belong vnto vs, forsoomuch as the continuance of this life is a proofe of Gods good will. For it neither is promised to vs, nor was promised to the Jews, as though it contained blessednes in it self but because it is wont to be to the Godlie a token of Gods tender love. Therefore if it chanceth that an obedient child to his parentes be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seen, yet doth God no leffe constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should reward him with a hundred Acres of land, to whom he promised but one Acre. Al consiseth in this, that wee should consider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blessing of God, & that it is his blessing so farre as it is a proofe of his favoure, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnessse and shew in effect to his seurants.

38 Moreover, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reverence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse haggeth over the stubborne and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: he pronounceth them by his lawes subject to the judgement of death.
The sixt Commandement.
Thou shalt not kill.

39 The ende of this commandement is, that forasmuch as God hath bound together all mankinde with a certaine vnitie, that every man ought to regard the safetie of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge, in summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore wee are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our traualle to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfullie imploie the same, that wee procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them free of hurt, and if they be in any daunger, that we give them our helping hande. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so faith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a fonde thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughtes of the heart, and principally restreth vp to them, should instruct nothing but the bodie to true righteousness. Therefore the manslaughter of the heart is also forbidden in this lawes, and an inward affection to preferre our brothers life is here giuen in commandement. The hand in deed bringeth forth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiueth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without bURNING in desire to doe him hurt. If. thou canst not be angry with him, then canst thou not hate him, forasmuch as hatred is nothing but an olde rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstancies: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt wilt still dally out with lustes to defend it, it is already pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghost, that he is a manslayer that hateth his brother in his heart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Christ, that he is guilty of judgement that is angry with his brother: that he is guilty of the counsel of faith that faith Rhacha: that he is guilty of Hell fire, that faith unto him, Fool.

40 The Scripture noteth two points of equity, upon which this commandment is grounded: because man is both the image of God and our owne flesh, wherefore vnlesse we will defile the image of God, we must have care to touche man none other wise, than as a sacred thing: and vnlesse we will put of all naturalnesse of man, wee must cherish him as our owne flesh. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from redemption & grace of Christ, shall be intreated of in another place. God willed these two things naturally to be considered in man, that might persuade vs to the preferation of him, that we should both reverence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our owne flesh. He hath not therefore escaped the crime of manslaughter, that hath kept himselfe from shedding of blood. If thou commit any thing indeede, if thou goe about any thing with endeour, if thou conceiue any thing in desire and purpose that is against the safetie of any other, thou art holden guilty of manslaughter. And againe: If thou doest not travaile to thy power and as occasion may serve to defend his life, thou doest with like haynousnesse offend the lawe. But if there be so much care taken for the safetie of his bodie, let vs hereby gather, how much studie and travaile is due to the safetie of his soule, which in the Lordes sight doth infinitely excell the bodie.

The Seventh Commandement.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

In the seventh commandement chastity and cleanness, therefore all uncleanness must be departed from vs. The summe therefore shall be, that we be defiled with no uncleanness or lustfull intemperance of the flesh. Whereunto answereth the affirmative commandement, that we chastly & continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbidden by name, to which all vnchaste lust tendeth that by the filthines of that which is more grosse & sensual, forsooth as it also defileth the body, he might bring vs to abhorre al filthy lust. Sith man was created in this estate, not to live a solitarie life, but to vse a helper ioned unto him: and since that by the curse of sinne he is driven the more to this necessitie, the Lord hath in this behalfe provided help for him so much as was sufficient, when hee ordained marriage, when hee sanctified with his blessing the fellowship begunne by his authoritie. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowship of man & woman out of marriage, is accursed before him, & that the fellowship of marriage it selfe, was ordained for remedia of necessitie, that we should not runne out into vnbridled lust. Therefore let vs not flatter our selves, fith we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of mariage, without the curse of God.

42 Nowe forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more exceedingly since the fall of man, we are become doubly subject to desire of companie of women, except it be those, whome God of his singular grace hath exempted from it: let every man looke well what is given vnto him. Virginitie, I graunt, is a vertue not to be despised: but thit it is to some denied, and to some granted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and struing with it, cannot get the upper hand, resort to the help of mariage, that so they may keepe chastitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceie this word, if they do not succour their owne intemperance with the remediethat is offered, and granted them, they striue against God and refiit his ordinance. And let no man carpe against me (as many do at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can do all things. For the helpe of God is present only with those, that walke in his wayes, that is in their vocation from which they do withdrawe themselves, which for taking the helpes of God, do travaile to overcome and maister their necisitie with vaine rash boldnesse. The Lorde affirmeth that continenciie is a singular gift of God, and of that sort that are not given generally, nor vniversally to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he faith, that there is a certaine kindes of men, that haue gelded themselves for the kingdome of Heauen, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely apply themselves to the affaires of the heauenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a little before, that all men are not able to receive it, but they to whom it is peculiarly given from heauen, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that euerie man hath his proper gift of god, one thus, and another thus.

43 Whereas we are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in every mans power to keepe chastitie in single life; although with studie & travaile he endeavour never so much vnto it, & that it is a peculiar grace, which God giueth but to certaine men, that he may haue the more readie to his worke: doe wee not striue against God and nature which he hath instituted, if wee do not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lorde forbiddeth fornication: therefore he requireth cleanliness and chastitie of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way, that every man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despise mariage as a thing vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise desitie single life, vnlesse he be able to live without a wife. And therein alio let him not provide only for the quiet & commoditie of the flesh, but only that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readines & prepared to all duties of godlinesse. And forasmuch as this benefite is given to many but for a time, let every man so long abstaine from mariage as he shalbe meete to live to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now layd vpon him a necessitie to marry. This the Apostle saith, when he commandeth that to avoid fornication every man haue his owne wife, & every woman haue her owne husband, that he that cannot live continently should marrie in the Lord. First he declareth that

To whome the gift of continenciie is not given, they must use the remediethat God hath ordined.

Mat. 19. 12.
1. Cor. 7. 7.

They sinne grievously against God which use it not although they keep them selves unflain with any bodily uncleanse

the most part of men are subject to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subject unto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth all to that one remedy, which with vouchsafe it is resoluted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to help their infirmity by this mean, they sinneth even in this that they obey not the commandment of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vouchsafe, while in the meaneseason his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastitie to be a cleaness of the mind, joyed with chastitie of the bodie. A woman vnmarried (laith he) thinketh upon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as he is holy both in bodie & in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to conforme that former commandement, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but he saith, that it is better to marry than to burne.

44. Nowe if married folkes doe confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lorde, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate & dissolute lust. For though the honestie of mariage do cover the filthines of incontinenci, yet it ought not forthwith to be a pronocation thereof. Wherefore let not married folkes thinke, that all things are lawfull vnto them, but let every husband haue his own wife soberly, & likewise the wife her husbande, and so doing, let them commit nothing vnseeming the honestie and temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be refrained to meaure & modestie, & not to overflow into every kind of extreme lasciviousnes. This wantonesse, Ambrose reproved with a saying verie fore in deede, but not vnsift for it, when he calleth the husband, the adulterer of his owne wife, which in vs of wedlock hath no care of shamefastnes or honestie. Last of all, let vs consider what lawmaker doeth here condemme fornication, euien he which soft of his owne right he ought to poisse vs wholly, requireth pureneffe of the soule, spirite & body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with vn cleanly gestures, and with filthie talke to laye wait to trap another's chastitie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a young man about measure wantonly and deceitfully clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchaft, if we have a regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthiness in whatsoever part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put these out of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastitie. If the Lorde require chastitie in vs, then he condemneth all that euery is against it. Therefore if thou count to swe we obedience, neither let thy mind burne inwardly with euill lust, nor let thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body bee trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthie talke entice thy minde to like thoughtes, nor let thy glutous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blotting, wherewith the pureneffe of chastitie is besotted.

The eight Commandement.

Thou shalt not steal.

45. The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteous oufuee, that every man may haue his owne rendred vnto him.

The summe therefore shalbe, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goodes, and that. therefore we are commanded every man to employ his faithfUll trauaile to preuaile to each man his owne goods. For theU we ought to thinke that what every man poUesseth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the soueraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by eVil meanes, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of the ftes there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goodes of an other are by any manner of force and robbing licentiousneffe bereaued. The other kinde consistseth in malicious deceit, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other forme there is that standeth in a more hidden subteUtie, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other forme in flatterie, where they are fuckd away by pretence of gift, But least wee shoulde tacie too long vppon renting of all the seuerall kindes of thefte, lette vs knowe, that all craftie meanes whereby the poffeffions and money of our neighbours are conueied vnto vs, when they once goe by crooked waies from syncerenes of hearte, to a desire to beguile, or by any meane to doe hurt, are to be accounted for thefte. Although by pleading the lawe they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwise weigh them. For hee feth the long captious subteUties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simper minde, till at length he draweth him into his nettes. Hee feth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth downe the weaker. Hee feth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftie taketh thee vnwaue.
Al which things are hidden from the judgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in monie, in waues, or in landes, but in euery mans right. For we defraude our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those dueties which we are bound to doe for him. If anie idle factor or Bayliffe do devoure his masters substance, and is not heedful to the care of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully spoyle, or do riotously waste the substance committed vnto him, if a servant doe mocke his master, if he disclose his secretes by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe if the Lord doe cruelly oppress his houholde, they are before God guillie of thefte. For hee both witholdeth and conueieth an other mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he owceth to other.

46 We shal therefore rightly obey this commaundement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seeke to get no gaine but honest & lawfull, if we couet not to wax rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighb or of his goodes that our owne substance may encrease, if we labour not to heape vp cruell riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together every way, by right & by wrong, that either our couetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigallitie satisfied. But on the other side, let this bee our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsell and helpe to kepe their owne to farre as we may: but if we have to doe with false and deceitfull men, let vs rather bee ready to yeeld vs some of our owne, then to strive with them. And not that only, but let vs communicate
Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

to their necessities, and with our store relieve their neede, whom we see to be oppressed with hard and poore estate. Finally, let every man looke howe much he is by dutie bound vnto other, & let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people haue in honor al those that are set over them, let them patiently beare their gouernment, obey their lawes & commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keeping God fauourable vnto them. Againe, let them take care of their people, preferue common peace, defend the good, restraine the evil, and so orderr al things, as readie to give account of their office to the fouereigne judge. Let the ministers of Churches faithfully apply their ministerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of salvation, but deliver it pure and sincere to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be ouer them, as good shepeherdes be ouer the sheepe. Let the people like-wis receiue them for the messengers and Apostles of God, give them that honor whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and minister vnto them such things as are necessarie for their life. Let pares take on them to teache, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and grieue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish and embrace them with such lenitie and tendernesse, as become theiur person. After which manner, we have already saide, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let yong men renounce old age, even as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also gouerne their weake-ness of youth with their wisdome and experience, wherein they excell yong men, not rating with rough and loude brawling, but tempering severitie with mildnesse and gentlenesse. Let seruants shewe themselues diligent & servisible to obey; & that not to the eye, but from the heart, as serying God himselfe. Also let matters shewe themselfies not testie and haarde to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpnesse, nor reprochfully vfe them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow seruants vnder the heauenly Lorde, whom they ought mutually to love and gently to intreate. After this maner, I say, let every man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreover, our minde ought alwaies to haue respect to the law-maker, that wee may knowe that this lawe is made as well for our mindes, as for our handes, that men should studie to defende and further the commodities and profite of other.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou shalt not be a lying wittnesse against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commandement is, that because God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to observe truth without deceitful colour. The summe therefore shall bee, that wee neither hurt any mans name eyther with flauders or false reportes, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that wee offend no man, by lust to speake euill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is joyned a commandement, that so farre as wee may, wee employ our faithfull endeuer for every man in affirming the trueth, to defend the safety both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expound the meaning of his commandment in the three & twenty first Chapter of Exodus, in these words: Thou shalt not vie the voice of lying, nor shalt thou weigh thy hand to speake false witness, for the wicked.

Again, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in another place he doeth not only call vs away from lying in this point that we bee no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceive his brother, for hee forbidde them both in severall commandments. Truely it is no doubt, but that as in the commandments before, he hath forbidden cruelty, inchafticie and courtesounes, so in this hee restraineth fallhood. Whereof there are two partes as we have noted before. For either wee offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backe biting, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking wee hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be understood solemnne and judicial testimony, or common testimony that is vsed in private talkes. For we must alwaies have recourse to this principle, that of all the genrall kindes of vices one speciall sort is set for an example, whereunto the rest may bee referre, and that that is chiefly choen, where in the filthinesse of the faulte is moste appareant. Also it were convenient to extende it more generally to flanders and finifter backebitinges whether with our neighbours are wrongfully greeued, for that fallhood of witnessing which is vsed in judiciall courtes, is neuer without periuries. But periuries in somme such as they doe prophine & defile the name of God, are alreadie sufficiently met withal in the thirde commandment. Wherefore the right vse of this commandment is, that our tongue in affirming the truthe, do sere both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name bee more pretious than anie treasures, whatsoever they bee: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoile of the goodnesse of his name than of his goods. And in bereaving his Iustue sometime false witness doeth as much as violence of handes.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent carelesnesse men doe commonlie offend in this point, so that there are founde very few that are not notables sicke of this disease: we are so much delighted with a certaine poisond sweetnesse both in searching out & in disclosing the euils of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes wee lie not. For he that forbidde thy brothers name to be desiled with lying, will thinke also that it be preferred untoe so far as the truthe will suffer. For howsoever hee taketh heede to himselfe onlie, so that hee tell no lie, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, for God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill speaking is vterly condemned. But wee mean not by euill speaking, that rebuking which is vsed for chastisement: nor accusation, or judiciall processes, whereby remedie is sought for an euill, nor publicke reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behoouveth they should be forwarned least they should be in danger by ignorance: but we mean onlie hateful accusing, which as feth of maliciousnes & of a wat to wil to backbite.

The great liberie which men gie themselves in transgressing this law by their wanton delight to backbete, to scoffe, to judge, or to heart them that doe so.

Exod. 23. 1.
Levi. 19. 15.
Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

Also this commandment is extended to this point, that we couet not to use a scoffing kinde of a pleasuantesse, but mingled with bitter tauntes, thereby bitingely to touch other mens faults under pretence of pastime, as manic doe that seeketh praise of meric conceites with other mens shame yea and griefe: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproched. Nowe if we bee bende our eyes to the lawemaker, which must according to his rightfull authority beeare rule no leffe ouer the eares and minde than ouer the tongue: truely we shall finde that greedinesse to heare backe bitings, & a hasting readinesse to euil judgements are no leffe forbidden. For it were verie fonde if a man shoulde thinke that God hateth the faulte of euill speaking in the tongue, and doeth not disallow the fault of euill maliciousnesse in the heart. Wherefore if there be in vs a true teare and love of God, let vs indue our soure as wee may and as is expedient, and as charitie beareth, that wee give neither our tongue, nor our eares to euill speakings, and bitter ictings, lest wee rashly without cause yeeld our minde to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expositours of all mens sayinges, and doings, let vs both in judgement, eares, & tongue gently preferue their honour safe.

The tenth Commandement.

Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house, &c.

49. The ende of this commandment is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule bee wholly possesed with the affection of loue: all lust is to bee shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may move our mindes with a concupiscence hurtfull and turning towards an others losse; wherewith on the other side agreeeth the commandement, that whatsoever wee conceiue, purpose, will or studie vppon, bee ioynd with the benefit and commoditie of our neighbours. But heere, as it seemeth, asiseth a harde and comberfome difficultie. For if it bee truely sayde of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are contained the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes shoulde afterwarde bee severally forbidden vs. But the distinction betweene purpose and coueting, will eaily lose vs this knode. For purpose (as we haue meant in speaking of it in the other commandements before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but coueting may bee without any fuche either aduisement or assent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and peruerse objectes. As therefore the Lorde hath heerefore commended, that the rule of charitie shoulde governe our wills, studies, and workes: so he nowe commaundeth the conceiptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there bee none of them crooked and written, that may prouoke our minde in another way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robberie, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be mowed thereunto.

50. And not without cause doth hee require so great uprightness. For who

who can deny that it is righteous, that all the powers of the soul be posse-sed with charitie? But if any of them do asoare from the marke of charitie, who can deny that it is diseased? Nowe whence commeth it that so manie desires hurtfull to thy neighbour, doe enter in thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest only for thy selfe? For if thy mind were altogether throughly kissed with charitie, no parcel thereof should be open to such impressions. Therefore it must needs be voide of charitie, so far as it recei-ueth concupiscence. But some man will object, that yet it is not meete that fantasies that are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length do vanish away, should be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the heart.
I answer, that here our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our minde, doe together bite and strike our heart with desire, forasmuch as it never commeth in our mynde, to wifhe for any thing, but that our heart is stirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commadeth a marvelous ferventnesse of love which he willeth not to be en-trangled with neuer so small shares of concupiscence. He requireth a marue-ously framed mind, which he will eth not so much as with flight provocations to be any thing stirred against the law of love. To this exposition Augusine did first open me y way: because thou shouldest not think it is without confect of some grame authority. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs al wrongfull coueting: yet in rehearing the same, he hath brought forth for example those things that most commonly doe deceuie vs with a false image of delight: because he would leave nothing to concupiscence whic he draweth it from these things, wpon the which it most of al rageth and triumpheth. Loe, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught suffi-cently what wee owe to men for Gods sake, wpon consideration whereof hanganeth the rule of charitie. Wherefore you shall but vainely call wpon those duties that are contained in this Table, vnlesse your doctrine do stay wpon the fcare and reuenerence of God, as vpon her foundation, As for them which seek for two commandements, in the prohibition of coueting, the wife reader, though I say nothing, will judge that by wrong dunion, they teare in funder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against vs, that this worde, Thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after he had first set the house, then he renteth the partes thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrues do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that every man possesteth, shouln remaine safe and untouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraud them, but also from the very least desire that may moue our minde.

51 But now to what end the whole law tendeth, it shal not bee hard to judge: that is, to the fullfiling of righteousesse, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man doe performe in decees, that which is there commanded, he shal in a manner expresse an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses meant to bring the summe thereof into the mindest of the Israelites, he said: And nowe Israel, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and walke in his waies? Thus him and serve him in all thy heart, and in all thy soule, and keepe his commandements? And he cease not still to sing the same song againe vnto them, so oft as he purposed to shewe the ende of the lawe. The doctrine of the lawe hath such respect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moses in an other place termeth it, makest man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Nowe, the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the two principal pointes alreadie rehearsed, That we love the Lord God with all our heart, all our soule, and all our strength, and our neighbours as our selues. And the first indede is, that our soule be in all partes filled with the loue of God. From that by and by of it selfe forth oweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sheweth when he writeth, that the end of the law is love out of a pure conscience, and a faith not fained. You see howe, as it were, in the head is set conscience and faith vnfained, that is to saie in one word true godlinessse, and that from thence is charitie derived. Therefore he is deceived, who focuer thinketh that in the lawe are taught onely certaine rudiments, and first introductions of righteousness, wherewith men became to bee taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true mark of good workes: whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paul, you can defire nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For howe farre I pray you, will hee proceede that will not bee contented with this institution, whereby man is instructed to the feare of God, to spiritual worshipping, to obeying of the commandements, to follow the wrightnes of the way of the Lord: finally to put enesse of conscience, sincere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that exposition of the lawe, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the duties of godlinessse and loue. For they that follow onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods wil, know not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52 But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the lawe, Christ & the Apostle do sometyme leaue out the first Table: many are deceived therein while they would faine draw their words to both Tables. Christ in Mathew calleth the chiefe pointes of the law, mercie, judgement & faith: under the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to me, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulnessse toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole lawe, take it for religiousnes toward God. But they labour in vaine. For Christ speacheth of those works wherewith man ought to prove himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also ceasle to maruell why, when a yong man asked him what be the commandements by keeping whereof we enter into life: he answered these things onelie: Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not comit adultery, Thou shalt not steale. Thou shalt beare no false witnesses. Honour thy Father and thy Mother, Love thy neighbor as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisteth in manner, all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeareth not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually vs. But the workes of charitie are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousness. But this commeth eche where so oft in the prophets, that it must needs be familiar to a reader, but meanely exercised in them. For in a manner alwaye, where they they exhort to repentance, they leave out the first Table, and only call upon faith, judgement, Mercy & Equity. And thus they do not overskip the fear of God, but they enquire the earnest proof thereof by the tokens of it. This is well known, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they do for the most part rest upon the second Table, because therein the study of righteousness & vprightnes is most openly scene. It is needless to rehearse the places, because every man wil of himselfe easly mark that which I say.

53 But thou wilt say, is it then more available to the perfection of righteousness, to live innocently among men, than with true godlineesse to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily keepe charity in all points, whereas he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby proved, that he hath godlineesse also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also reftifie by the Prophet therefore he requireth not our duties to himself, but doth exercise vs in good works towards our neighbor. Therefore not without cause the Apostle seteth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charity. And not inconveniently in another place he calleth the same the fulfilling of the law: adding that he hath performed the law that loue his neighbour. Again, That all the law is comprehended in one word, Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe, For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doeth when hee saith: Whosoever ye will that men doe to you, do ye the same to them, For this is the lawe and the Prophets. It is certaine that in the law and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, and that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the lawe is onely prescrib'd vnto vs an observa-<ref>Deut. 6.6</ref>tion of right and equitie, wherein wee be exercised to teftifie our godly fear of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Herefore therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall bee best framed to Gods will and the rule of his lawe, when it shall bee euerie way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole law there is not read one syllable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as hee shall doe or leave vndone to the commoditie of his owne fleche. And surely fith men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they bee too much carried all headlong to the loue of themselves, and howe muche soever they fall from the trueth yet still they keepe that selfe loue, there needed no lawe any more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyond measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the loue of our felues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the commandments, and that hee loueth best & most holily, that (soeene as may be) loueth & travelleth least for himselfe, & that no man loueth worse & more wickedly than he that loueth & travelleth for himselfe & only thinketh upon & seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to express & with what great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because hee had no other vehementer or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner off speaking is diligently to bee wedy. For hee doeth nor, as certaine Sophistis haue foolishly dreamed, give the first degree to the loue of Our charitie te-<ref>Ps. 3.7</ref>wards men is a proofe & exercisefullifying our religi-<ref>1 Thess. 4.10</ref>on towards God.

<ref>Ps. 14.3</ref>
of our selves, and the seconde to charitie, but rather that affection of love which we doe all naturally drawe to our selves, he giueth away vnto other, whereupon the Apoftle faith, that Charite seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to be esteemed worth a harte that the thing ruled is euer inferior to his Rule. For God doth not make the loue of our selves, a rule wherunto charitie towardde other should be subject, but where as by perpetu"nesse of nature, the affection of love was wont to rest in our selves, he fheweth that now it ought to be elswhere spread abroad, that we should with no leffe cheerefulnes, ferventnes, and carefulnes be readie to doe good to our neighbour than to our selves.

55 Now 6th Chrift hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that under the name of Neighbour euery man is contained bee hee neuer so strange vnto vs: there is no cause why we shoulde restraine the commandement of love within the bounds of our owne friendships and acquaintances, I deriere not that the nearer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarie hee is to bee holden with our iendeuours to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requirith, that so many ioc duties of friend men shoulde communicate together, as they are bounde together with streighter bondes of kinred, familiaritie or neighbourhooode, and that without any offence of God, by whose prudence wee are in a manner driuen thereunto. But I say that all mankinde without exception is to bee imbraced with one affection of charitie, and that in this behalf is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God and not in themselves: from which consideration when we bee kneale, it is no maruel if wee bee entangled with manie errours. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of Loue, we must not turne our eyes vnto man, the fight of whom would ofter enforce vs to hate then to loue, but vnto God which commandeth that the loue which wee offer him, be powred abroad among al men: that this bee a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoever the man bee, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoolemen of these commandements, touching not desiring of revenge ment, and louing our enimies, which in the olde time both were giuen to the Iews and at the same time were commonly giuen to all Chriftians, haue made Counsels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they haue pestled over to Monkes which were thought but in this one point to sooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keepe the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdenous and heauie, specially for Chriftians that are under the lawe of grace. So dare they presume to repel the eternal law of God touching the louing of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in anie leafe of the law? and are not therein the rather ech where founde commandements that doe most seuerely require of vs to loue our enimies? For what manner of saying is that, where wee are commanded to feede our enimie when he is hungrie: to set into the right waie his Oxen or Asses straying.

Study out of the way, or to cause them when they faint under their burden? Shall we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good will to himself? What is not the word of the Lord everlastling? Leave vengeance to me, and I will require it. Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place. Seek not vengeance, neither be mindful of the injury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, & not lyingly faine that he was a counsel guer.

And what I praise you for these things that they have presumed to mocke withall in their vainaurie glose? Love your enemies, doe good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, bless them that curle you, that ye maie bee the children of your father which is in heaven. Who cannot heare reason with Chrisostome, that by so necessary a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandements? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monkes shall be the children of the heauenlie father, they only shall be bold to call vpon God their Father; what shall the Church do in the meanseason? it shall by like right be sent away to the Gentils & Publicans. For Christ faith: If ye be friendlie to your friends, what fauour looke you for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (faith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touche the wife of thine enimie than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leave to sticalc nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enimie. But these two, not to sticalc, & not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compass of the rule of love, yea & teacheth that they are contained vnder this commandement, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expeditor of the law, or it necessarly followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loved, euery by commandement, like as our friends. Therfore they do truely bewray themselfes to bee the children of Satan, y do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of y children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine with more groffe dulsnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of the olde writers y do not pronounce as of a thing certain, y these are mere commandements. And that eu{e in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without controversie taketh them for commandements. And how foolish do they reason? They lay y they are too weightie a burden for Christias. As thoghe there could be deuised any thing more weighty than to love God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this lawy any thing may be comped easie, whether it be to love our enimie, or to lay away al desire of revenge out of our mind. In deed all things are high & hard to our weaknes even the least title of the law. It is the Lord in whom we see strength Let him giue what he commandeth, & command what he wil, Christians men to be vnder the law of grace, is not unbridledly to wander without lawe, but to be grafted in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the law, & by whose spirit they haue a

We are not colliedd only in the law, but commanded to love, doe good to, & pray for, and bless our enimies as the reason annexed, that ye may be the children of your father doth shew: & so the fathers have underlyed it, neither is the reason any thing against it, which they bring concerning the hardness of performing it.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of law written in their hearts. This grace Paul vnproperly called a lawe, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men do in the name of the law dispute upon a matter of nothing.

58 Of like sort it is that they called Veniall sinne, both secret vsngodli-nessfethat is against the first Table, & also the direct transgressing of the last commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without adjured affent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We forbid to have strange gods. When the minde taken with the engines of distrust, looketh about everywhere, when it is toucht with a sodaine desire to remove her blessednesse some other way: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule emptie, to receive such tentations? And to the ende not to drawe out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement giuen to love God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the love of God, we have already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdom, & interrupt his decrees, do prove that God hath not his throne well established in our conscience. As for the last commandement, wee haue already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guilty of coueting, and therewithal are made transgressors of the law, because the Lorde doth forbid vs, not only to purpose & practice any thing that may be to anotheres losse, but also to be pricked & swell with coueting. But the curse of God doth alway hang over the transgression of the law. We cannot therefore prove even the very least desires free from judgement of death. In weyng of sinnes (sayth Augustine) let vs not bring false balances to weigh what we list and how wee lift at our own pleasure, sayings this is heavy & this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lordes treasurie, and let vs therein weigh what is heavie; rather let vs not wey, but reknowledge things already weyed by the Lord. But what saith the Scripture? Truely when Paul saith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this stinking distinition. Sith we are too much inclined to hypocriticks, this cherisment thereof ought not to have been added to flatter our slothful consciences.

59 I would to God they would consider what that saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so shalbe counted none in the kingdome of heauen. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the lawe, as if it were not woorthie of death? but they ought to have considered, not only what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authority is diminished in every transgression, how little souer it be, of the law that he hath giuen in comandement. Is it a small matter with the, that Gods majesty be offended in any thing? Moreover if God hath declared his will in the lawe, whatsoever is contrarie to the lawe, displeaseth him. Will they imagin the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not soorth with follow upon them? And he himself hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voice, than to trouble the clare truth with their unfaavourie sutlleties of argument. The soule (faith he) that sinneth, the same shall die. Again, which I euen now alleaged, the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they grant it to be a sinne, because they cannot desine it; yet they stand stiffe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they have hitherto too much borne with their owne madnesse, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, wee will bid them farewell; and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the wil of God, which of necessitie provoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the lawe, upon which the judgement of God is pronounced without exception: and that the sinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercie of God.

_That Christ although he was knowen to the Iewes under the lawe, yet was delivered only by the Gospell._

Because it pleased God in the old time not vainly by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vaine he did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: euen then without doubt hee was known in the same image, wherein he now appeareth to vs with full brightnesse. Therefore Malachie, after that hee had bidden the Iewes to take heed to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in stude thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a Santee of righteousnesse. In which wordes he teacheth, that the lawe availeth to this purpose, to holde the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when hee should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophets did make search, & diligently enquire, of the salvation that is now opened by the Gospell; and that it was reveiled vnto them, that they should minisiter, not to the Iewes, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was vnprouitable to the people in old time, or nothing availeth themselues: but because they enjoyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little slip of it, there is offred vnto vs a more plenitie full enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmed that he had witnessed borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eyes that see that which ye see, & blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many kings and Prophets have wifhed it, & have not obtained it. This is no small commendation of the reveiling of the Gospell that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place difagreeeth not, where it is said, that Abraham fawe the day of Christ, and rejoysed. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, ye he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that.
Cap. 9. Of the knowledge of that joy which accompanied the holy Prophet, even to his death. And that saying of Iohn Baptist: No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten that is in the bosom of the father, hath declared him unto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had bin dead before him, from the fellowship of the understanding & light that shineth in the person of Christ: But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that those mysteries, which they sawe but darkely vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diuersly and many ways spake in old time by the Prophets, but now by his beloved Sonne, although therefore that only begotten one, which is at this day to vs y bright neffe of the glorie, and the print of the substance of God the father, was in old time knowne to the Lewes, as we have in another place allaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the old deliverance: yet is it true, which the same Paul els where teacheth, that God which command the light to shine out of darkness, hath now shined vpon our hearts to set forth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Jesus Christ: because when hee appeared in this his image, he did in a manner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke & shadowy forme that had bin of him before. And so much the more foule & detestable is their unthankfulnes & peruerstnes, that are here to blind at midde day. And therefore Paul faith, that their mindes are darkened by Sathan, that they shoulde not see the glorie of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

2. Now I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the mysterie of Christ. I grant truely, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the lawe, concerning the free forgiveness of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselue, are accounted partes thereof. For hee compareth faith against these terrors, wherwith the conscience should be troubled & vexed, if salvation were to be sought by works. Whereupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it al the testimonies that God in old time gave to his fathers, of the mercie and fatherly favour: But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of the grace giv'n in Christ. And that meaning is not onely received by common vs, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that hee preached the Gospell of the kingdom. And Mark maketh his preface in this maner, The beginning of the Gospell of Lefus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to proue a thing sufficiently knowne, Christ therefore by his comming hath made cleere the life and immortalitie by the Gospell. By which wordes Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkeenesse of death, vntill the Sonne of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogative of honor to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a newe and vn-wonted kind of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Sonne. For although the faithful have alway found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their heartes: yet because hee hath accom-accomplished all parts of our salvation in his flesh, therefore that self-juicy delivering of the things rightfully obtained a new & singular title of praise Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ: Hereafter ye shall see the he-auens open, and the Angels of God ascending & descending upon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to have relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his com-ming by this mark, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the tenre thereof may stand familiarly open to all men.

3 But yet we must take heed of the diuellish imagination of Servetus, which when he goeth about, or at least saiffeth that he goeth about, to extol the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, utterly abolisheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospel there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference between vs & Christ. I did in deede euene now declare that Christ left nothing unperform'd of his whole summe of our salvation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we do alreadie enjoy the benefits purchas'd by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our salvation is hidde in hope. I grant in deede, that wee by believing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the meanse season we must hold this saying of Iohn, that although we know we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shalbe like vnto him; that is, til we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospel present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof lieth still hidde vnder the keeping of hope, till being vnclad of the corruptible flesh, wee be transfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the meanse the holy Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthie dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promis as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promis of life that is in him.
And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that we haue the same promises, which in the old time were giuen to the holye men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spiritue of promise, but yet wee doe no otherwise enjoy Christ, but so farre as wee embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he in deede dwelleth in our hearts, & yet wee wander in journey abroad from him: because we walke by faith, & not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together: that we possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospel sheweth with her finger that thing, which the law did shadow vnder figures.

4 And hereby also is their errorr convinced, which do neuer otherwise compare the lawe with the Gospel, but as they compare the merites of workes with the free imputation of righteousness: Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be rejected: because Paul doth oftetimes understand by the name of the lawe, a rule to live righteoucly, wherein

The Gospel is not so opposed to the lawe, as reaching another waie of saluation, but the same more plainly,
Cap. 9. Of the knowledge of God requireth of vs, that which is his, not giving vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse, if we do not so little swarve from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous, because the observation of the lawe, whereunto the reward is promised, is no where founde. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousness of the law and of the Gosspell, contradictory the one to the other. But the Gospel did not so succeede in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diuerse meanes of saluation, but rather to confirm and proue to be of force, whatsoever the lawe had promiseth, and to joyn the bodie to the shadowes. For when Christ sayeth, that the lawe and the Prophets were vntil John: he maketh not the fathers subject to the curse, which the bondservants of the lawe can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so as they stayed a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the gospel. Therefore Paul calling the Gospel the power of God, to saluation to every beleeuer, by and by addeth, that it hath winnesse of the lawe & the Prophets. But in the end of the same Epistle, although he sheweth that the title of praise of Iesus Christ is the revelation of the mysterie kept secret in the euerlafting times: yet he doth qualify that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that he is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon wee gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole lawe, the Gospel differ-eth from the lawe onely in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath beene laid open for vs in Christ, it is now not without cause saide, that at his comming the heanenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

5 Now betwene the lawe and the Gospel came John, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Christ the lambme of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed forth the summe of the Gospel, yet because he did not express that same incomparable strengthe and glory, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ faith, that he was not equal to the Apostles. For so do those words of his meane: that though John excelle among the sinnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he. Because he dooth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred John before the Prophets, he advaunceth the preaching of Gospel to the highest degree: which preaching wee see in another place signified by the kingdome of heaven. But whereas John himselfe doeth aunswere that he is but a voice, as though he were inferior to the Prophets, he doth not that for fained humilitie sake, but meaneth to teache that the proper office of the Embassadors was not committed to him, but that he only executeveth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachie: Behold, I sende Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible daye of the Lorde doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeavoure to get disciples to Christ: as also Elias pro-oueth, that this was enjoyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is cal-ed a candel burning & shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no les, but he may be reckned among the publishers of of the Gospel, like as he said the same Baptisme, which was afterward delivered to the Apostles. But that which he began, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken up from them into the heavenly glory.

The x. Chapter.
Of the likeness of the old and new Testament.

By the things aforesaid it may nowe appear euidently, that all the men whome from the beginning of the world God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bond of the same doctrine, which nowe remaineth in force among vs, bounde in covenaut to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adioyne vnto it for an addition, fith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of all one Mediatour, how farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that wee haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for proofe thereof, do make it plaine that there was never any other rule of religion and godliness in the people of God: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many things spoken of the difference of the olde and newe Testament, that may make the reader that is not of verie sharpe judgement to be in doubt: therefore wee shall rightfully appoinone peculiar place for the better and more exact discoursing of this matter: Yea, and that thing also, which otherwise shoulde haue bene verie profitable for vs, is nowe made necessarie by that monstrous sofull Sernaustus and by divers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptiftes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondly faine to have bin fatted vp by the Lorde here in this earth, without any hope of heavenly immortality. Therefore that we may kepe away this pestilent error from godly minde, & also to plucke out of them al doubts which are wont by and by to arise vpon hearing mention of the diversitie betwene the olde and the newe Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what covenant the Lorde made with the Israelites in the olde time before the coming of Christ, and what covenaut he hath nowe made with vs since Christ hath beene openly shewed.

2 And both these points may be made plaine with one worde. The covenaut of all the fathers do differeth nothing from ours in substance and in the matter it self, that it is altogether one and the selfe same: but the ministration is divers. But because of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a cernaine understanding, we must needs proceede on with a longer declaration if we mean to profite any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shall be superfluous to discourse againe of new vs on all the special particulars that haue alreadye been declared: and it shall be out of season to mingle those things togethe: fhe that remaineth yet to be spoken in other places. Here wee must chiefly rest vpon three principal points: First, that wee holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the marke

The fathers had the same covenaut which we haue: they looked for immortallitie and had it promised: they expected it by merie and not by merie: they knewe that Christ was their mediator to obtaine merie, as well as vve.

appointed to the Jewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosen vnto the hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the covenant whereby they were joyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the only mer- cie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knewe Christ the mediatour, by whom they should both be joyned to God and enjoy his promises. Of which points, because the seconde peraduenture is not yet sufficiently known, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many & cleare testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodnes and tender favour, whatsoever good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israel. The thirde also hath alreadie had here and there some plaine declarations of it, & have not left the first altogether vntouched.

Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most controversie about it, we will employ the more earnest trauaile: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in convenient place be added. Truely, the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he faith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospel, which he afterward published according to the time appointed, Again, that the righteousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospel itself, hath wittnesse of the lawe and the Prophets. For the Gospel doeth not holde the hearts of men in the joy of this present life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doeth not fasten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope layd vp in heaven, doth in a manner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in an other place. Since that ye beleued the Gospel, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spiritue of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Again, we have heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is laid vp for you in heauen, whereof ye have heard by the true speech of the Gospel. Again: He hath called vs by the Gospel to the partaking of the glorie of our Lord Jesus Christ. Wherefore it is called both the word of salvation, and the power of God to save the faithfull, & the kingdom of heaven. Now if the doctrine of the Gospel be spiritual, and openeth the entrie to the possession of an incorruptible life: let vs not think that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe over and neglect the care of their soule, and live dullie like beasts in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here caull that the promises which are sealed in the lawe and the Prophets, concerning the Gospel, were ordained for the new people. For within a little after that which he spake of the gospel promised in the law, he addeth, that all the things that the law containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are under the lawe. I graunt in deed, it is in an other argument. But he was not so forgetful, that when he had once saide, all the things which the law containeth belong to the Jewes, he did not remember what in a few verses before he had affirmed of the gospel promised in the law. Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the old Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he faith, that under it are contained the promises of the Gospel.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stood upon the free mercy of God, and also was confirmed by the means of Christ. For the very preaching of the Gospel pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are justified by the fatherly kindness of God, without their own deserving, & the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Whom dare make the Jews without Christ, with whom we hear that the covenant of the Gospel was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation? Who dare make them strangers from the benefit of free salvation, to whom we hear that the doctrine of the righteousness of faith was ministered? But, that we dispute not long of an evident matter, we have a notable sentence of God. Abraham rejoied that he might see my day; he saw it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was vniuersall in the faithfull people, when he faith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, & for ever. For he speakereth not there onely of the eternall godhead of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed Virgin and Zacharie in their songs, doe say, that the salvation revealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in old time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lord in giving his Christ, discharged his old othe, it cannot be faide but that the ende thereof was alway in Christ an everlast-\(\text{a}ng\) life.

5 Yea, and the Apostle doth make the Israelites equal with vs, not only in the grace of the covenant, but also in signification of sacraments. For meaning by examples of punishments, wherein the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they should not runne into the like offences, hee beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why we should challenge any prerogative vnto our selves, to deliver vs from the vengeance of God which they sustained, forasmuch as the Lord did not onely grant vnto them the same benetit, but he hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if hee should haue saide: If yee trust that yee be out of perill, because both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye daily receiue, have excellent promises, and in the meaner time despising the goodnes of God, ye are licentiously wanton: Knowe ye, that the Jews also were not without such sacraments, against whom yet the Lord did most severely put his judgements in execution. They were baptised in passing over the Sea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the Sunne. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion was wrought to our spiritual Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth here to have this taken away from the Christians, y they thinke that they excell the Jews by the prerogative of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subjicet to this caullation: that they did cate the same spirituall meate that we cate, and dronke the same spirituall Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of spiritual drinke, which he expoundeth to be Christ.

6 To overthrow this sentence of Paul, they object that which Christ saith: Your fathers did eat Manna in the wildernesse, and are dead: he that eateth my flesh, shall not die for ever. Which two places are very easily made to agree together. The Lord, because he then talked to hearers that sought only to be filled with foode of their bellie, but cared not for meat of the foule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacitie, but specially he frameth the comparison of Manna and of his body, according to their sense. They required that he, to get himselfe some credite, would approve his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the Wildernesse, when he obtained Manna from heauen. But in Manna they conceiued nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they feared not to that higher mysticke which Paul hath respect vnto Christ therefore, to shew how much greater a benefite they ought to looke for at his hand, than that which they reported that Moses did bestowe upon their fathers. Frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, & worthie to be remembred, that the Lord by Moses ministred foode from heauen to his people, to sustaine them for a small time, that they should not perish for hunger in the wildernesse: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meat that giveth immortalitie. We see why the Lord passed over that thing which was principal in Manna, and spake only of the basest profit of it: even because the lewes as it were of purpose to reproche him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna; he answered that he is the minister of a much higher grace, in comparison whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because he knewe that the Lorde when hee raigned Manna from heauen, did not onely poure it downe for the feeding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysticke, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that part that was most worthie of consideracion. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heauenly life, which nowe the Lorde vouchsafteth to grant vnto vs, were not only comminicated vnto the lewes, but also sealed with verie spirituall Sacramentes. Of which matter Augustine dispurreth largelie against Faustus the Manichee.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue testimonies allledged vnto them out of the law & the Prophetes, whereby they may perceive that the spirituall covenant was common also to the fathers, as wee heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also follow that desire, and so much the more willingly, because by that meanes the aduersaries shall bee more surely convinced, so that they shall have afterward no way to daille. And I will begin at ye profe, which although I knowe that the Anabapistes pride will thinke verie fonde and in a manner to be laughed at, ye shall much auail with such readers as are willing to learne and have their sound wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the worde of God, that whome so euer God vouchsafteth to bee partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For this saying of Peter hath alwaye beene of force, that that it is the incorruptible seed which abideth for ever, as also he gathered out of the words of Esay. Now 6th God in the olden time bound these unto him with this holy bond; it is no doubt that he did also sever them into the hope of eternal life. For when I say they embraced the wordes, which should ioyne them nigher to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it: not that general manner, which is powered abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the world, although it do quicken all things, every one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doeth not deliver them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this special manner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a manner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, 6th Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaved vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortal kingdom of God. For it was a sound parraking of God, which cannot be without the benefit of eternal life.

8 But if his seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the verie forme of the covenant, which shall not onely satisfie sober wits, but also that sufficiently convince their ignorance that bend themselves to speake against it. For God did always thus covenant with his servants: I will be to you a God, and ye shall be to mee a people. In which worde the Prophetes themselves are wont to expounde, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For David doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicitie sake, but because hee deliuereth them from death, he preserueth them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternal mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophetes. Thou art our God, wee shall not die: The Lorde is our king, our lawmaker, hee shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israel, because thou art saued in the Lord God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needeslese, this admonition is founde eche where in the Prophetes, that wee shall want nothing toward all abundance of good things, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lorde bee our God. And righfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation, to what man shall hee openly shewe himselfe for his God, but that hee will also open to him his treasur of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the midst of vs: as hee testified by Moses. But such presence cannot be obtained, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spiritual life plaine enough in these worde: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousness remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring everlasting saluation with it.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testify that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the ende that their hope not contented with present benefites, should be extended to eternitie.
And many sayings do shew, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not only in present evils, but also for the time to come, do comfort themselves with this, that God will never fail them; Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assisted them of the blessing of God to bee prolonged unto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seed after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posterity, much more would his favour not fail toward the elect. For God is not like unto men, which do therefore care their love to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so they can not employ their friends deings upon them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifulnes is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruit of the mercie, which for their fakes he persuaded out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lordes wil was by a notable profe to set forth unto them the greatness and flowing plentue of his goodnes, which they should feel after death, which he described it to be such as should flowe over into al their posterity. And the truth of this promise Lord did then scale, & as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when he named himself the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, long after their death. For, what had it not bin a fond naming, if they had utterly perished? For then had it bin all one, as if he had faide, I am the God of them that are not. Whereof the Evangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Saints were so driven to a straite, that they could not denye, that Moses did testify the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereup on it was ease to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the judge of life and death had receiv'd into his safeguard, custodie, & protection.

Nowe (which is the principal point whereupon this controversy hangs) Iet vs looke, whether the faithfull themselves have not bene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceived that they should have a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enjoy'd them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most unhappie, even with only remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painful labor hardly sustaine his neediness, and that he shou'd not be press'd with the curse of God, in the only labours of his hands, even there receiv'd hee extreme sorrow of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sons, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left alive, whose sight he worthily destreet and abhorred. Abel cruelly murthered in the very flower of his age, became an example of the wretchednes of men. Noe, while the whole world carelessly lined in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearies in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should have dy'd an hundred deaths. For beside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne moneths, there is nothing more unpleasant than to be holden so long in maner drowned in dung of beastes. When he had passed out so great difficulties, he fell into newe matter of griefe, hee sawe himselde forned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefit of God he had received safe from the generall flood.

11 Abraham in deed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if we consider his faith, which is set foorth vnto vs for the best rule of belieuing, of whose kinred wee must be accounted, that wee may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithful, and not to possesse so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be thrown downe out of the number, no not from the most honourable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Now as touching the experiences of his life: When he was first called by the commandement of God, he was pucked away from his countrey, his parentes and his friends, in whom men thinke to bee the chieff sweetenesse of life: even as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoyle him of all the pleasures of life. So soon as hee came into the lande where he was commanded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine.
Thither he fled for succour, where to faue himselfe, hee was compelled to deliver out his wife to be abused, which wee knowe not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deathes. When hee was returned into the lande of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that lande, wherein a man must so oft be hongrie, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewith-all hee was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that hee must needes redeeme his life with the losse of his wife, while manie yeres long he wan-dred uncertainly thither and thither, hee was compelled by the continuall brawlinges of his seruantes to put away his nephewe, whome he loued as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt he did no otherwise take than if hee had suffered the cutting off of one of his limmes. A little after, hee heard that hee was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whither fo-ever he went, hee founde neighbours outrageously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drink water out of the welles that himselfe had digged with great labour. For hee would not haue redeemed the vs of them at the hand of King Gerar, if hee had not first beeene forbidden.
Nowe when he came to olde age, hee sawe the thing which is the most unpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, tull beside all hope he begate Israel, whose birth yet he paid deere for, when hee was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if hee in maintaining the stubbornesse of his bondwoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his housholde. At length Issac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Israel must, as forfaken, be cruelly cast out of doors. When onely Issac was left, in whom the weared age of the fillie good man might rest, within a little after he was commanded to kill him.
What can mans wit devise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Issac had died of any sickenesse, who would not haue thought the old man most miserable, yet had hee given him in mockage, for whom his grief of want of children should be doubled? If he had beene

Cap. 10 Of the knowledge of

... the unhappiness of the thing would have much encreased his miserie. But this paiteth all examples of miserie, to have him slaine with his fathers owne hande. Finally, hee was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man woulde in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man object that hee was not altogether unhappie, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempests. For we cannot say that he lived a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully weare th out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euils, yet scarce euer tooke any taff of sweetenesse. He also felt the same vexations, that do not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chaced him out of the lande of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that hee was faine to strive for his wate: at home in his owne house, hee suffered much troubled somnesse by his childrens wive: he was grieved with disagreements of his sonnes, and could not remedie that to great a mischeefe, but by the banishment of him whom he had blessed. But as for Jacob, he is nothing else but a notable example of extreme infelicite. Hee past his childhood most vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrours of his elder brother, to which at length hee was compelled to give place. When hee was fledde from his parentes and his native countrey, beside that it was a greeuous thing to live in banishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently receiued of his uncle Laban. Then it sufficed not that hee had seued seven yeare a harde and cruell servcie, but that also must bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wive tooke hee was driven into newe service, where hee was all the day fried with heathe of the sune, & all the night lay waking and pained with frost and colde, as himselfe complained. While he by the space of twenty yeares suffered so hard a life, hee was dayly vexed with newe injuries of his father in lawe. Neither was hee quiet in his owne house, seeing it divided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enui of his wive. When he was commanded to returne into his countrey, he was compelled to watch an advantage to take his journey, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could hee not so escape the vnjust dealing of his Father in lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his journey. Then fell he into a much more cruell disstresse. For when he came neere to his brother, hee had so many deaths before his eyes, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemie. So was hee above measure tormented and as it were drawn in sunder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers comming, when he came once in his sight, hee fell downe as halfe dead at his feetes, untill he founde him more fauourable than he durst haue hoped. Beside that, at his first entrie into the lande, he lost Rachel his dearely beloued wife. Afterward he heard worde that the sonne which he had by her, & whome therefore he loued aboue the rest, was torn with wilde beasts: by whose death how great griefe hee coecuued, he himselfe declared in this that... after long weeping hee obstinately stopped vp all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leaving himselfe nothing, but to goe down to his sonne wayling into the grave. In the meantime howe great causes of grieue, waiting and wearinesse were the rauihment and despaioing of his daughter, & the boldnesse of his sonnes in requening it, which not onely made him to bee abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that countrey, but also procured him most present peril of utter destruction? Then followed that horrible outrageous offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as there could not chance a more greeuous. For whereas the defiling of a mans wife is reckoned among the higheft ill fortunes: what is to be said of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a little while after, his house is spotted with another vnnatural adulterie: so that so many shames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while hee sought to provide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tydings of a newe misfortune, understanding that another of his sonnes was kept in prizon, for recovering of whome he was compelled to leave to the rest Benjamin his onely darling. Who can think, in that such a heap of miscifes he had any one moment gven him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the best witnesse of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his dayes were short & euill vpon the earth. Nowe truely hee that declareth that hee hath passed his life by continual miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperitie which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindly and vnthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truely professed that he had bin miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that hee had not his hope fastened vpon earthly things.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as undoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truely they both thought and sawe it to be another maner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle alfo doeth shewe excellently well: Abraham (laih he) direct by faith in the lande of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with Isaac & Iacob partners with him of the same inheritance, for they looked for a citie let vpon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promised, but looking at them a farrre off, and belieuine and confessinge that they were geffiti and strangers vpon f land. Whereby they declare that they fought for a countrie, & if they had beene mowed with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they fought for a better, that is the heavenly countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bin duller than blockes, to followe promisef so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vnlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefly enforceth, & that not without good reason, that they called this life a journey from home, even as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers & foreiners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lords promise, whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the

Lordes promis, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one soure in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receive the fruit of the promis til after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that hee compelled his sonne Ioseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be removed thither.

The hope which David had of immortalitie.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the travailes of this life they had always set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Iacob have so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his child: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by words which he spake among his last breathings: Lord, I will looke for thy salvation. What salvation could he have looked for, when he sawe that he laie ready to give vp the Ghost, vnlesse he had scene in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute we of the holy ones & children of God, when euery man was not without a taste of understanding, which otherwise was enemie to the truth? For what meant Belshazzar when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like unto theirs? But that he meant the same thing that David afterward vterted, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is verie euil? If the uttermost bound & end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference betweene the righteous & vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diversitie of the estates that after death shall befall to them both.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitfulness of the ground and plentie of all things. And yet (vnlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall covenant. But if we come downe to the Prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life everlastring and the kingdom of Christ doe vter themselves. And first of all David, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, he shewed the heavenly mysteries in shadowes more darkly than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie direccteth he all his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence telespith: I am here a forreiner & stranger, as all my fathers were. Everie living man is vanite, every one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? even to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfaist, keepeth stil a stedfaistnesse of hope in God, considereth his felicitie laid vp in another place. To such consideration is hee wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as hee meaneth to comfort them truely. For in another place after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitorie & vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: but the mercy of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred hundred and second Psalm. At the Beginning Lord thou didst lay the founda-dation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy handes. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe old like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparel, but thou remaine the selfsame, & thy yeares shall not faile: the sonnes of thy servaunts shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be established before thee. If the godlie ceaseth for the decarie of heaven and earth to be established before the Lorde, it followeth that their salvation is joyned with the eternitie of God. But that hope cannot stande at all, un-lesse it rest upon the promise that is set forth in Ephes: The heavens (saith the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth shall be wore out like a garment, & the inhabitanites of it shall perish like those things: But my salvation shalbe for euer, and my righteousnes shall not faile: where euerlastingnes is given to righteousnes and salvation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither male wee otherwise take those thinges, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous successe of the faithful, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heavenly glory. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliver them from the hande of the sinner.
Light is arisen to the righteous, and joy to the vpright in heart. The righ-teousnes of the godly man abideth for euer: his horne shall exhale in glorie, the desire of the sinner shall perish. Again: the righteous shall confesse unto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. A again: the righteous shall be in eternal remembrance. Again: the Lord shall redeeme the soules of his servaunts. For the Lorde oftentimes leaueth his servaunts to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to be torne in pieces and destroyed: he suffereth the good to lie languishing in darkenes and filth, while the wicked do in a maner shine among the stars. And he doeth not so chere the with the brightnes of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladnes. Wherefore even he also hideth not, that if the faithfull fasten their eyes vpon the present state of things, they shall be striken with a fore temptation, as though there were no favour or reward of innocency with God. So much doth wickednes for most part prosper & flourish, while the company of the godly is oppressed with shame, pouerty, contempt & alkindes of crosses. It watheth but little (saith he) that my soote slippeth not, and my steppes fell not abroad, while the fortune of sooles grieueth mee, & while I see the prosperitie of the wicked. At length after rehearal of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could understand these thinges. But it is a torment to my spirit, till I enter into the sanctuarie of the Lord, and understand the last end of them.

17 Let vs therefore learne yet by this coesession of David, that the holy fathers under the old testament were not ignorant, how seldome or neuer God doth in this world performe to his servaunts those thinges that he promiseth the, & that therefore they did lift vp their minds to Gods sanctuary, wherein they had that laid vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last judgement of God, which when they could not see with eies, they were content to understand by faith. Trusting vpon which: assiounce, whatsoever happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings do witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousness: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Again: As a greene Olive tree in the house of the Lord, Againe, The righteous shall flourish as a Date tree, & shall spred in branches like the Ceder of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They shall still bear fruit, they shall be fat & greene in their old age. When he had paid a little before: How deep are thy thoughts? O Lorde, while the wicked do flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for ever, Where is that faire thewe & beautie of the faithful, but when the face of this world shalbe turned inward by disclosif of the kindome of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternity, they despised the hardnes enduring, but a moment of present miferies, & boldly burst foorth into these words: Thou shal not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw down wicked heads long into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternal destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicitie, this is also reckened in another place, that they close vp the end of their life in a moment without long languishing. Where is that so great steadfastnes of the holy ones, whom David himselfe ezech where complaineth, not only to be shaken with trouble, but also to be oppresssed, & utterly broken in pieces? Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is unstable & more unstable than the ebbing & flowing of tides, but what the Lord will do, when he shall one day set for the eternal setting of heaven & earth. As in another place he excellently well describeth it: The foolish do stay vnpon their welthines, and are poude because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flourish in neuer so great dignitie, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can paye to God the price of his ransom, but whereas they see that both the wife do die, & that the wicked also & fools do perish & leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shal abide for euer, & their dwellings to the end of ages, & they aduanse their names uppon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shalbe like to the beasts that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their posteritie do greedily follow. They shalbe placed like a flocke in Hell, & death shall have rule over them. When the light ariseth, the upright shal have dominion over them, the beautie of them shal perish, Hell is their dwelling house. First, this laughing to scorne of the foolish for that they rest on the flipperie & rolling good things of this world, doth shew that the wife must seake a farre other felicité. But there he more evidently discloseth the mysterie of the resurrection, where after the destruction & extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) that we calle that, but the reueling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life?

18 From thence did spring vp that consideraion, which the faithful oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miferies and remedie of patience: It is but a moment in the Lorde's displeasure, and life in his merce. Howe did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in afflication in a manner their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of God's kindnes kindnes, whereof they scarcely felt any little taste? If they had stucked fast upon the earth, they could have found no such thing, but because they looked upon the heavens, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the cross, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do last the world's age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and never ending destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayinges: The remembrance of the righteous shall be in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the fight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked most euill. Againe in Samuel: The Lord shall keepe the feete of the holy, & the wicked shall be put to silence in darkenes. Which doe declare that they well knew, that howsoever the holy were diversely caried about, yet their last end is life and salvation: and that the prosperity of the wicked is a pleasant way, whereby they by little and little slide forwaerde into the gulf of death. Therefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the uncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherfore David could not devise a more grievous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19 But above all other, notable is that saying of Job: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the last day I shall rise againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my sauiour. This hope is laid vp in my boosome. Some that have a minde to make a shew of their sharpe wit, doe caull that, this is not to be understood of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Job looked to have God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they wil or no, that Job could not have come to that largenesse of hope, if he had refted his thought vppon the earth. Therefore we must needes confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortallitie to come, which fawe, that his redeemer would be present with him, even lying in his graue. For to them that think only of this present life, death is their vtermost desperation: which very death could not put off Job's hope. Yea though he kilde(faid he) theinfikes. I will still hope in him. And let no trifler here carp against me and say, that these were the sayinges but of a few, whereby is not proued such doctrine was among the Jewes. For I will by & by answere him, that these fewe did not in their sayings vter any secret wisdom, whereunto onlie certaine excellent wits were feueraly and privately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of people, so they openly publisht those mysteries of God, that were to be vniueraUy learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore whoe we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spiritual life so clearly & plainely in the Church of the Jewes, it were a point of vntolerable stubbornnes to send them away onelie to the fleadlike covenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthlie wealthinesse.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophetes, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for vs to get the vpper hande in David, Job, and Samuel, heere it shall bee muchie more easie. For God kept many false behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visit the iniquity of the dweller upon the earth against him, and the earth shall swell forth her blood, & shall no longer hide her face.

22 Albeit a man should do sordidly, that would go about to draw all to such a rule. For there be some places that without ane covering doe shewe the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithful in the kingdom of God, of which sort we have recited some, & of like sort are the most parte of the rest, especiallie these two, the one in Ezechiel. As a new heauen, & a newe earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your seede stand, and there shall be none of monther, and Sabbath of Sabbath: all shall come to worship before my face, faith the Lord. And they shall go out & see the dead carcasses of the men that have offended against mee, that their worme shall not die, and their fire shall not bee quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall rise vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sons of his people, and there shall come a time of difference, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people be saued that shall bee found written in thy booke. And of those that sleep in the dust of the earth, there shall awake some to eternal life, and some to everlasting shame.

23 Now, as for proving the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their covenant, & that they reposed in him at their affiance of blessing, I will not travaile therein at all, because they have both lesse controversy & more plainesse. Let vs therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the diuell may be removed, that the old testament, or covenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compass of earthly things, but also contained the promise of the spiritual and eternal life: the expectation whereof must needs have beene implanted in all their minds that truly consented to the covenant. But let vs put farre away this mad & pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Jews nothing else, or y the Jews sought nothing els but filling of their belly, delights of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outwarde power, fruitfulness of children, & whatsoever a natural man estemmeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdom of heavne to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, & Jacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Jews of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospel, for that they were the children of the Prophet, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lord had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not he witnessed with words only, the Lord also approved it by deede. For in the very moment y he rose againe, he vouchsafed to have many of the holy men to rise againe in company with him, & made them to bee seene in the Citie: so giving an assured tokke, that whatsoever he did & suffered for the purchasing of eternal salvation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithfull of the old testament, than to vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued with y same spirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparcle of immortalitie, whereupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Wherby it is so much the more marvelous in the old time the Sadduces fell to such grosse-nesse.
Of the knowledge of

ness of error, that they denied both the resurrection & also the substance of souls, both which points they sawe sealed with so clearre testimonies of Scripture, And no lesse to be marueiled at, even this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdom of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should have that punishment for refusing the Gospel. For so it behoved, by the just judgement of God, to strike those minde with blindness, which in refusing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themselves into darkness. Therefore they read and continually turne over Moses, but they are stopp'd with a veil set between them and him, that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shall it remaine covered & hidden from them, til he be turned to Christ, from whom now they travaile to lead and draw him away so much as in them lieth.

The xi. Chapter.

W hat then wilt thou say: shall there be no difference left between the old Testament and the Newe? & to what purpose serve all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrary? I do willingly allow those differences that are reheard in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the verity alreadie established, as it shalbe plaine to see when we shall haue entreated them in order. Those differences are (as farre as ever I could remember) chieflye foure in number, to the which if you lift to adioyne the fifth, I am not against it. I say and tryst to prooue that they are all suche as rather belong to the manner of ministreation, than to the substance of them. And by this meane they shal nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the olde and newe Testament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Nowe the first difference is, that although, even in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the minde of his people, and to have them raised vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gave it to be scene or rather to be tasted of, vnder earthlie benefites: but nowe having revealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospel, hee more cleerely and plainly directed our minde the streight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exercising which he vsed with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any higher thay to the good things promis'd to the body. They to ofte haue the land of Canaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods lawe. They haue that God threatneth nothing more seuerely to the trasgressors of the same lawe, than that they shalbe druen out of the possession of the same land, & scattered abreade into strange regions. They see y in a manner to this effect come all the blessings & curles that are pronounced by Moses. Hersby they do undoubtedly determine, that the Ierue not for their owne sake, but for others, were seuered from other nations, y is, that the Church of Christ might haue an image, in whose outward forme
That in all their proceedings, they might see examples of spiritual things. But such as the Scripture doth sometimes shew, that God himself directed all the earthly benefits that he did for them to this end, that so he might lead them by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefits: it was too much unskillfulness, I will not say blockishness, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our controversy with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of the land of Canaan was to the Israelites their chief and last blessings, & that to vs after the revealing of Christ, it doth but figuratively signify the heavenly inheritance. On the other side we affirm, that they did in the earthly possession which they enjoyed, as in a looking glasse beholde the inheritance to come, which they beleued to be prepared for them in heaven.

2 That shall better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galatians. He comparseth the nation of the Jews to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himselfe, followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolemaister, to whose custodie he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies of the temple, that nothing hindreth but that it may also very fitly serue to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacitie to enter vpon and vse. The same Church was among them, but where of the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lorde kept them vnder this schooling, that he gave them not the spiritual promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therfore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posteritie vnto hope of inheritacie, he promiseth them the land of Canaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirm themselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceived there was given them a higher promise to testifie that that land was not the highest benefit of God. So Abraham was not sufferd to lie slothful in the promise receiued of the lad, but his mind was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lorde. For Abraham heard this saide vnto him: I am thy protector, and my reward exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transtorie & slipperie rewarde in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adioyneth the promise of the lande to another intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayings do declare. So David rifieth vpward from temporall blessings, to that same higheft & last blessing: My heart (faith hee) & my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, the Lord is the parte of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that saust mine heritage for me. Againe, I have cried vnto thee, O Lord, I have saide, Thou art my hope, my portion in the lande of the living. Truely they that dare so speake, doe without doubt profess that with their hope they clime above the world, and all the good things here present. But the Prophets doe oft describe this blessednes of the world to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstood. That the godly shall shall possesse the land by inheritance, and the wicked shalbe destoryed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kind of riches, and Sion overflow with plenty of all things. All which wee see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true country of the faithfull, and that heavenly citie wherein the Lord hath commaunded blessing and life for euer.

This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the olde testament, did esteeme the mortal life & the blessings thereof more than is now meete to do. For although they knewe well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to mind, what markes of his grace the Lord had pointed therein, to exercife them according to the small rate of their tenderenes, they felt a greater sweetnes of it, than if they had considered it by it self. But as the Lord in testifying his good wil toward the faithful, by present good things, did in shadowe express the spirituall felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side hee did in corporall paines shew examples of his judgement against the reprobate. Therefore, as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the vsnskilfull did not weye this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishments & the rewards, they maruel at so much alteration in God, that in old time was so sudenly readie to take vengeance on every offence of man with fterne & horrible punishments, and now as if he had laid awaye the affection of his old angirnes, hee punishth both much more gentlie & feldomer, yea, & for the same cause they doe almoft imagine feuerall gods of the old & new testament: whiche the Manichees did in deed. But we shall easily be deliuered from such doubts, if we lay our minde to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie & set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporal benefits, and the greuousnes of the spirituall death, by corporall paines. Whereby hee deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded vp.

Another difference of the olde and newe Testament is saide to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew only an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in stead of the body. But the new testament giueth the truth present, and the sound body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wheresoever the newe testament is in comparison set against the old: but it is more largely entretayed of in the Epistle to the Hebrews than anywhere else. There the Apostle disputeth against them, which though the obseruation of Moses lawe might not be taken away, but that they should also drawe with them the ruine of all religion. To confute this error, he vseth that which had bin forespoken by the Prophet concerning the prieshood of Christ. For whereas there is given him an eternall prieshood, it is certain, that that prieshood is taken away, wherein new successes were daily put in, one after another. But he proue eth the institution of this new prieshood is to be preferred, because it is establisht with an oath. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the prieshood, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessary to be, he proue eth by this reason: for that the weakeens of the lawe was such that it could help nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weaknesses, even this, that it had certain outward righteousness of the flesh, which could not make the observers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beasts, it could neither wipe away sins, nor purchase true holiness. Hee conclude therefore that there was in it a shadow of good things to come, but not the lively image of the things themselves: and that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is delivered in the Gospel. Here it is to be seen, in what point the covenant of the law is compared with the covenant of the Gospel, and the ministerie of Christ with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, there were there great difference betweene the two testamentes: but sith the point of our cafe leadeth vs another waye, wee must tend to this ende, to finde out the truth. Let vs then set forth here the covenant which he hath established to be eternall, and never to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be established and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to bee as it were solemnne signes of the confirmation. Nowe this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the lawe ought to glue place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verily additions & things adjoined, or (as the people call them) necessarie things to the covenant, yet because they were instruments, or means of the administratio thereof, they beare the name of the covenant itselfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other sacraments. Therefore it is true, the old Testament is in this place called the solemn forme of confirming the covenant, conteined in ceremonies and sacrifices. The Apostle saith, that because in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behoved that they should be discontinued & abrogated, that place might be giuen to Christ the atterer & mediatour of a better testament, by whom eternal sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained under the law. Or if you like it better,thus: That the old testament of the Lord was that, which was delivered, wrapped vp in the shadowish & effectual obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) had in suspense until it might stay upon a more stedfast & substantiall confirmation: and that then onely it was made new and eternall, after that it was consecrate & established by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gave at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new testament in his blood: to signify that then the testament of God attaineth his truth, by which it becometh new and eternall, when it is sealed with his blood. Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle saith: that in the school of the law, the Jews were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a scholemaster. For it behoved, that ere the sonne of righteousness was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnesse of revelation, nor so great depth of understanding. Therefore God so gave them in measure.

Sure the light of his word, that they saw it as yet far off, anddarkly. Therefore Paul expresseth this fchenderness of understanding by the tearme of yong age, which the Lordes will was to have to be exerceted with the elements of this worlde and with outward observations, as rules of instruction for children vntil Christ shoulde shine abroade, by whom it behoved that the knowledge of the faithfull people shoulde growe to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe meant of, when he said, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vntill lohn, and that from thence forth the kingdom of God is preached. What did the law and the Prophetes open to men of their time? even this, they gave a taste of that wisedome which in time to come should be plainly disclofed: and they shewed it before as it were twinklingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Christ might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdom of God set open. For in him are laid abroad the treasures of wisedome and understanding, whereby we attaine, even in a manner, into the secret clofets of heauen.

6 And it maketh not against vs, that there can scarcely any one be found in the Christian Church, that in excellencie of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophetes excelled in such force of spirit, that even at this day they lighten the whole worlde withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lorde hath bestowed upon a fewe, but what ordinarie disposition he vshed in teaching his people: suche as is declared in the Prophetes themselves, which were endued with peculiar knowledge above the rest. For euens their preaching is darke and enclofed in figures, as of things a farre off. Moreover howe marvellous knowledge focuer appeared in them above other, yet forasmuch as they were druen of necessitie to submitte them to the common childish instruction of the people, they themselves also were reckoned in the number of children. Finally, there never chanced any such cleare sight to any at y time, but that it did in some part favour of the darkenesse of the time. Whereupon Christ said, Manie kinges and Prophetes have desired to see the things that ye see, and have not seen them: and to heare the things that ye heare, and have not heard them. Therefore blessed are your eies, because they see, and your ears because they heare. And trulie it is meet that the presence of Christ should have this excellencie of prerogative, that from it should arise the cleare revealing of the heauenlie mysteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which euens now alleaded out of the first Epistle of Petre, that it was opened to them, that their trauel was profitable, principally for our age.

7 Nowe I come to the thirde difference, which is taken out of Ieremie, whose wordes are these: Beholde the day shall come, faith the Lord; and I will make a newe couenaunt with the house of Israel, and the house of Juda, not according to the couenaunt that I made with your Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hande, to lead them out of the lande of Egypt, the couenaunt that they made voide although I ruled over them: But this shalbe the couenaunt that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put my lawe in their bowelles, and I will write it in their hearts, and I wilbe mercifull to their iniquitie. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they shal al know me, ito the least vnto the most. Of which wordes words the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison beweteene the lawe and the Gospell, that hee called the lawe a literall, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, he said, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in heartes: that the lawe was the preaching of death, the Gospell the preaching of life: the lawe the preaching of damnation, the Gospell the preaching of righteoussesse: that the lawe is made voyde, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that wee weigh the wordes of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Abcet, there is some vnlikeess between them. For the Apostle speakeoth more odiously of the law than the Prophet doeth: and that not in simple respect of the lawe, but because there were certaine naughtie men, hauing a wrong zele to the lawe, which did with pervert euere the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the lawe, according to their errour and foolish afection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they doe by comparison set the olde and the newe testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The law doth commonly in euery place conteine promisses of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elsewhere, therefore they are not reckoned as parte of the lawe: when the meere nature of the lawe is spoken off. The onelie thing they acribe vnto it, to commaunde thinges that are right, and to forbid wicked doings: to promisse reward to the followers of righteoussnes, and to threaten punishment to the transgressors: but in the meane time neither to change nor amend the peruerfessesse of heart, that is naturally in all men.

8 Now let vs expound the Apostles comparison, one peece after another. The old testament is literal, because it was published without the effectuall workings of the spirite: The new is spiritual which the Lord hath spiritually grauet in the hearts of men. Therefore the second diuersitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can do nothing but wrap al mankind within the curse: The new is the instrument of life, because it deliuereth from curse, and restoreth into favoure with God. The olde is the ministrie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vnrighteoussesse: The new is the ministrie of righteoussnes, because it receueth the mercie of God, by which wee are made righteous. The last diuersitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the olde testament had an image of thinges absent, it behoued that it should in time decay and vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giveth the true bodie indeed, keepeth stil a firme and perpetuall stedfastnes: Theolmeh indeed calleth even the morall lawes, a weake and fraile covenant: but that is for another reason, because by the sodain falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by & by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cano not properlie be laid vp to the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weaknes were dissolved by the comming of Christ, had the cause of their weaknesses within themselues. Now, that difference of the letter & spirite is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Iewes without any fruite at all, having none of them converted vnto him: But it is spoken by waie of comparision, to advance the abundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a newe personage, did honorable setting forth the preaching of the Gospell. For if wee reckon vp the multitude of these whom the Lorde out of all peoples hath by the preaching of th: Gospell regenerate with his spirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, wee shall saie, that there were verie fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israel, that with afflication of minde and entirely from their heart embraced the covenant of the Lord: who yet were verie manie, if they bee reckoned in their owne number without comparision.

The fourth difference, the one hold the conscience is straundome and feare, the other giveth libertie and joy.
Rom. 8.15.
Heb. 12.18.

Gal. 4.11.

9 Out of the third difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the olde Testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens minde: but the newe testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and assurance. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romaines. Yee haue not received the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirite of adoption, by which wee erie Abba father. Hereunto setteth that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that the faithful are not nowe come to the bodlie mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlwinds, darkness and tempeft, where nothing can bee hearde or seen but that striketh mens minde with terror, inasmuch that Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice founded, which they al beseought, that they might not heare: But that wee are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the livyng God, the heavenly Jerusalem, But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that wee haue alledged out of the Epistle to the Romaines, he setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Gentiles, when he maketh an allegorie of the two fones of Abraham, after this maner, that Agar the bond woman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Israel received the lawe: Sara the free woman is a figure of the heavenly Jerusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bond, which maie neuer come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the lawe wee are made subject to bondage, by the Gospell onelie wee are regenerate into freedome. But the summe commeth to this effect that the olde testament did strike into confciences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made joyfull. The olde did holde confciences bounde into the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Israel they obtayned againe vs the holic fathers, who is it is evident, that they were endued with the same spirite that wee are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the hosc same freedome and joye. Wee answere, that neither of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themselves by the lawe to bee both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with unquettorthesse of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospell, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruite of the newe Testament, that beside the common lawe of the olde testament they were exempted from these euils. Moreover, over, wee will doe that they were so endued with the spirit of frendome and assurednesse, that they did not in some part seeme both scare and bondage by the law. For howsoever they enjoyed that prerogative which they had obtained by grace of the Gospel, yet were they subiect to the same bondes and burdens of obseruation, that the common people were. Such therefore they were compelled to the careful keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like unto bondage, and the hand writings whereby they confessed themselves guilty of sinne, did not discharge them from being bondes: it maye righteouly be saide, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and scare, while wee have respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vnsed with the people of Israel.

10. The three last comparisions that wee have recited, are of the lawe and the Gospel. Wherefore in them by the name of the Old Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospel. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckoned vnder the name of the old testament, therein he thought verie well, and meant euery lawe thing that we doe nowe receiue, for he had regard to those sayings of Hieronime and Paul, where the old testament is feuered from the worde of mercie and grace. And this also he verie aptly adjoineth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through hope there have obeyed the commandements, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the New testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly and temporall, but spirituall, heauenlie, and eternall good things, principally beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not ministred vnto them, both to doe good, and to have pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Sanes whome the Scripture rehearsed to have beene from the beginning of the worde chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betwene our division and Augustines; that ours (according to that sayeng of Chrifte: The lawe and the prophets were vnto Joib: from thence forth the kingdom of God is preached) doth make distinction betwene the electACHINE of the Gospel, and the darker distribution of the worde that went before: and Augustine doth onely feuer the weakeinesse of the law from the strength of the Gospel. And heere alfo is to bee noted concerning the holie fathers, that they so lued vnder the old testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and imbraced the aflured partaking there of. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednesse, which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Chrift. For to speake nothing of the rest what greater blindness can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outward sprinkling of water? than to secke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though hee were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that The fift and last difference between the two testaments; the old was given only to the Israel, the new to all nations.

Acts 14.16.

The calling of the Gentiles under the new testament spoken off by the prophets, not foddainly proceeded unto by Christ, by the apostles scarce admitted, wondred at by the very angels themselves.

Cap. 11

flickes faft in the observations of the law without respect of Christ.

11. The fifth difference that we make addeth, lieth in this that until the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe severall the covenants of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he divided the sonnes of Adam (faith Meser) his people fell to his possession: Is: celate the corde of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heaven and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy God: He cleansed only to the fathers, he loved them to choose their seede after them, even your seed out of all nations. Therefore he vouchsaied, to grant the knowledge of his name to that people one and, as if they only of all men belonged unto him: he laid his covenant as it were in their bosomes: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatives. But (to omit the rest of his benefits, & speak that which only here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meanes 2ason he suffered other nations to walk in vanitie, as though they had not any enter course or anything to do with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, give them that which was, onlie the remedy, namely the preaching of his word. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sonne that was his dealing, other were strangers: Israel was known to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darkness: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nigh unto him. But when the fulnesse of time was came, appointed for the resuming of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was delivered indeed, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holde the mercie of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to the that were farre off, even as to them that were neere adioyned, that beeing together reconciled to God, they might growe into one people. Wherefore now there is no respect of Grecce or Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whom the nations are given for his inheritance, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that universally without difference he might have dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the uttermost endes of the world.

12. Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is clearly shewed the excellency of the new Testament above the oide: it had in deed been before testified by many, and most plain oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still differed unto the kingdom of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not proceed unto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but differed it so long until that all the parts of our redemption being performed, and the time of his abasement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is above all names: before whom all knees should bow. For which cause when this convenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Chanaan, y he was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And he suffered not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye, (faith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the lost sheepe of the house.
13 In these four or five points, I think I have well and faithfully set forth the whole difference of the old and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this variety in governing the Church, this diuerse manner in teaching, so great alteration of ages and ceremonies, to be a great absurdity: they are also to be answered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may bee done shortly, because the objections are not so strong that they need a curious confutation. It followeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alwaystedsfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as afterwarde to disallow the same thing, which hee had before both commanded and commended. I answer, that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied diuerse forms to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expedient for every one. If the husbandman appoint to his householde one sort of business in winter, and another in Sommer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconstancy, or think he be swarthy the right rule of husbandrie which agreeeth with the continual order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household do instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childhoode, of another in youth, and of another in mans state, wee cannot therefore say that hee is sicker and forsooke his owne purpose. Why therefore doe we charge God with reproche of inconstancy, for that he hath feuered the diuerstie of times, with fit & agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfy vs. Paul maketh the Jews like unto children and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this government of God that he held them in their childish lessons, which according to capacity of their age were fit for the, & instructed vs with stronger & as is more manly discipline. Therefore herein appeareth the constancy of God.
Cap. 11. Of the knowledge of God that he taught one self same doctrine in all ages, and continued therein requiring the same worship of his name, which he commanded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forms and manner thereof, in that he shewed not himself subject to change but so farre he tempered him selfe to the capacity of man, which is divers and changeable.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diversity. But because God wil led it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the coming of Christ, reveale the eternal life in plain words without any figures, instructing those that are his with a few sacramentes and cause to perceive, give his holy spirit, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is even like as if they should quarel with God for that he hath created the world both. So late, if he might have created it from the beginning: or for that his wil was to have enterchanged courses betweene Winter & Summer, betweene Day and Night. But as for vs, even as all godly men ought to think, let vs not doubt that whatsoever God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes wee know not the cause why it ought so to have been done. For that were to take precipitously too much upon vs, not to give God leave to have the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from vs. But it is marvellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beasts, and all that furniture of the Lествical priestshood, whereby in the old time he was delighted: As though these outward & transitorie things did delite God, or any way moue affectio in him. We have already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the salvation of man. If a Phisition do heale a yong man after one very good meanes from his disease, & afterward do use another maner of healing with the same man being older: shall we therefore say, that he hath refus ed the manner of healing which before pleaseth him, but rather continuing stil in the same, hath consideration of age? So behued it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by another sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is meete that nowe being already delivered, he be represented by other signes. But concerning Gods calling, now at the coming of Christ, more largely spread abroad among all people that it was before, and the graces of the holy ghost more plentifully powered out: who, I pray you, can deny it to be right, that God haue in his owne hande and wil the disposing of his owne graces, to give light to what nations it pleased him? to raise up the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him: to give what doctrine & how great profiting & success of doctrine it pleaseth him: and in what ages he wil, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their unthankfulness: and againe when he wil to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therefore, that the cauallations are too much vnmeete, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the minde of the simple, to make them call either the righ teousnes of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

The xii. Chapter.

Thar is behoved, that Christ, so performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.
No we it much behoved vs that he should be both God and man, which should be our Mediator, if a man ask of the necessitie, it was not indeede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonlie call it, but it proceedeth from the heavenly decree, whereupon hanged all the salvatiọn of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud betwene him and vs, & vrtherly excluded vs from the kingdom of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attaine vnto God. But who could haue attained vnto him? Could any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shunne the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels, but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly & vnfeuerably cleawe vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the verie majestie of God would descende vnto vs, for we could not ascende vnto it. So it behoved that the sonne of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutual ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither could the sufferings be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disaggreement betweene our inckines, & the most pure cleaneenes of God. Although man had stood vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a mediator. What could he then do being plonged down into death and hel with deadlie fall, defiled with so many spottes, stinking with his owne corruption, and overcomen with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forthe Christ for the Mediator, doeth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (fayth he) of God and man, the man Jesus Christ.

He might haue saide, God: or at the least hee might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knewe our weakenesse: therefore to provide for it in time, hee vsed a moost fit remedy, setting among vs the sonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, hee putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea so neere that he toucheth vs, forasmuch as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there euene the same thing, that in an other place is set out with more words: that we haue not a bishop that can not haue compassion of our infirmities, forasmuch as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

That shall also appeare more plainely, if we consider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, so to restore vs into the favour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hel, the heires of the kingdom of heauen. Who could do that, vnlesse the sonne of God were made also the sonne of man, and so take ours vnpon him to conuay his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earnest we truften, that we are the children of God, because the natural sonne of God hath shapen for him selfe a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might bee all one with vs. Hee dislayned not to take that vnpon him which was proper vnto vs.

vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himself; and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of GOD and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhooe which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he saith: I goe to my father and your father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen assured vnto vs; for that the ancie sonne of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethre: because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same cause very profitable, that he which should be our redeemer, should be both very God and very man. It was his office to swallowe vp death: who could doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to overcome sinne; who could doe that but righteousnesse it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the worlde and of the aire: who could do that but a power aboue both worlde and ayre? Nowe in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his ancie begotten sonne, made him selfe our redeemer, when his will was to haue vs redeemed.

3 An other principal point of our reconciliatió with God was this, that man which had lost himself by his disobedience, shoule should for remedy set obedience against it, shoulde shoule the judgemet of God, & pay the penalty of sin. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his fleete in obeying his father, to yeeld our fleete the price of the satisfaction to the just judgement of God, & in the same fleete suffer the pain that we had deserued. For as much as therefore neither being onelie God, he could feele death, nor being only man he could overcome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one subiect to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wraffle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore that spoile Christ either for his godhead or for his manhood, do indeed either diminishe his majestie and glory, or obsteure his goodnes: but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they doe thereby weaken & overthrow, which can not stand but resting vpon this fundamet Befide that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and David, which God had promised in the lawe and the Prophete. Whereby the godly minde doe gather this other fruite, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to David and Abraham, they doe the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I even now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature between him and vs is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God: that he cloathed with our flesh vanquished death & sinne together, that the victory so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he receiued of vs, that having made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltinesse, and appease the just wrath of his father.

4 He that halbe diligently heedful in considering these things as hee ought, will easily neglect these wandring speculations that raish vnto them light spirits and defirous of nouellies of which sortis, that Christ shoulde have beene man, although there had bin no neede of remedie to redeeme mankind. I grant that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature incorrupted, he was set as head over Angels & men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But fith all the scripture crieth out that he was cloathed with flesh, that he might be the redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or ende. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough known: cuen to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being loft. Therefore vnder the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithful to hope that God would be merciful to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, hee should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, cuen the law was not yet published, the Mediator was never promised without bloud: we gather that he was appointed by the eternal counsell of God to purge the filthines of mens, for that the shedding of bloud is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God & men. That one specially notable testimonie of Esaias shall suffice vs for al, where he foretelleth, that he shall be striken with the hand of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be vpon him: & that he should be a priest that should offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his woundes should come health to others and that, because all haue strayed and beeene scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punishe him, that he might bear the iniquities of a l. Sith wee heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, who so ever pass eth beyond these bounds, he doeth too much folowe foolish curiosite. Now when himselfe was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming, to appease God, & gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So John before that he teacheth y the Worde was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speakeith thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gave his only begotten sonne, that who euer beleeueth in him should not perishe, but haue everlaeting life. Againe: The houre is cometh that the dead shall hear the voice of the sonne of God, & they that heareth shall liue. I am the resurrection & life: he that beleeueth in me, although he be dead, shall liue. Againe: The sonne of man commeth to save y which was lost. Againe: The whole neede not a Physician. I should never make an end, if I should rehearse all. The Apostles doe all with one conferre call vs to this fountain. And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honor of the priesthood shoulde haue come to nothing. Forasmuch as the priest appointed meane be between God & man to make intercession: & he should not be our righteousnes, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he should be spoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And alio that saying of Paul should prove vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, God hath sent his owne sonne, that in likenesse of the flesh of sinne hee should satisifie for vs. Neither will this stande that hee teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the good.
Cap. 12.

Of the knowledge of

goodness of God and his infinite goodness toward men, when Christ was given to be the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture uttereth where assigneth no other end why the sonne of God would take upon him our flesh, and also received this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father towards vs. So it is written, and so it behoved that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loathed me, because I gave my life for the sheep, this commandement hee gave me. As Moses lift vp the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place: Father, saue mee from this hour. But I am therefore come even to this hour. Father, glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the end why he took up, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sort doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise given to the fathers, to give light to them that are in the shadowe of death. Let vs remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whome Paul in another place testifieth, that all the treasures of knowledge & wisdom are hidden, and beside whom he glorifieth that he knoweth nothing.

If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things prove the contrarie, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testifie his love toward them, being preserued and safe. The answer is short, that for a much as the holy ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two things were joyned together, that Christ should be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawful for vs to search any further. For who so ever is tickled with desire to knowe any more, hee being not contented with the vnchangeable ordinance of God, doth shewe also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was given vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth to what end he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predestination, hee verie fitly represteth all wantonnesse & itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his wil: and he accepted vs in his beloved sonne, in whom we have redemption by his bloud. Truely here is not the fall of Adam sett before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his wil was to help the mysterie of mankind.
If the aduersarie object againe, that this purpose of God did hang upon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough & more for mee, to say y they with wicked boldnesse breake forth to saie them a new Christ, whofoever suffer themselves to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ than God hath foreappointed them by his secrete decree. And for good caufe did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirite of understanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, brendth, and depth, euen the loue of Christ that surmounteth all knowledge: even as if of purpose he would set barrs about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not be it nearer or little, suarue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, this is a faithful saying (as Paul testifieth) that Christ is come to saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospel, was given us in Christ before the times of the world: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Against this modestie Osander carrieth vnjustly which hath againe in this time unhappily stirred this question before lightly moved by a fewe. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the sonne of God should not have appeared in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this intuition is confuted by no testimonie of scripture. As though Paul did not bridle soward curiositie, when after hee had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, he by & by commandeth to auido foolishe questions.

The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly cotepted to seme wittie, they mowed this question, whether the sonne of God might have taken upon him the nature of an Asse. This monstrousnes which all the godly doe woorthily abhorre as detestable, let Osander confute with this pretens, that it is never expressly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paul accompacth nothing precious or worthie to be known, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Asse to be the author of saluation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth, that Christ by the etern-nall counsell of his father wasordained to be a head to gather all things together, will never the more acknowledge another that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it, that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashoned after the pattern of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had alreadie decreed to clothe with our Fleth. Wherupon he ga-thereth, that if Adam had not fallen from his first and uncorrupted origi-nall state, yet Christ should have beene man. How trifling this is and wretched, al men that haue sound judgEMENT, doe easily perceive of themselves.
In the meantime first he thinketh that he hath seene what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not onely shine in those excellent giftes wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for mee, although I grant y Adam did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true and highest perfection of dignitie) yet I say, that the like nesse of God is no where else to be sought, but in those marke of excellency wherewith he had garnished. Adam above other living creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men do grant with one consent; & therefore that whatsoever ex-cellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that the only begotten sonne he approched to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to haue his glory seen as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he adaunced by the benefite of the only begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same sonne was a common head as well to Angels as to men, so that the same dignitie that was bestowed upon man, did all belong unto angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconvenient to deny, y there is somthing in them wherein they resemble their father. Nowe if his will was to haue his glorie to be represented as well in Angells as in men, and to be scene in both natures, Osiander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then let behind men, because they did not bear the image of Christ. For they could not continually enjoy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no other way renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleave together under one head. Finally, if wee beleue Christ, this shalbe our last felicitie, to be made of like founre to the Angels, when wee shall be received vp into heauen. But if Osiander will conclude, that the original patern of the image of God was in Christ as hee is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needes have beene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth alfo to them.

7 Therefore, Osiander hath no cause to scare, that God should be found a liar, vnlesse it had beene first stabdly and vnchangeably decreed in his minde, to haue his fonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he shou’d with the Angels have beene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore have beene necessarie, that the fonne of God shou’d be made either man or Angel And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the vnchangeable counsel of God had bin before the creati0n of man that Christ shou’d be borne, not as the redeemer but as the first man, hee shou’d have lost his prerogatiue: forasmuch as now he should be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is to restore mankinde being lost, and so it might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should hee so much abhorre that which the Scripture openly teacheth, that hee was made like vnto vs in all things, except sinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to reckon him the fonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine knowe why Paul calleth Christ the second Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should haue bin called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was alreadie before known man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same patern. But Paul in naming him the second Adam, setteth meane betwene the first beginning of man and the restitution which wee obteine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to haue nature restored to her first degree, Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the fonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander reasoneth ill & vnsavourily, that Adam, so long as he had stand without falling, shou’d have beene the image of him selfe and not of Christ. I answere by the contrarie, because though y fonne of God had neuer put on fleshe, neuertheless both in the body and in the soule of man shou’d have shined the image of God, in the bright beams whereof it alway appeareth, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the soueraigne supremacie in all. And so is that foolish subteltie asfoiled, which Osiander bloweth abroade, that the Angels shou’d have lacked this head, vnlesse it had beene purposed by God to cloath his fonne with fleshe, yea, though there had beene no faulte of Adam. For he doeth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath

no supremacy ouer Angels, that they should have him for their Prince, but in so much as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the words of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternal worde of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures, not that he is create, or ought to be reckened among creatures: but because the state of the worldes in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beautie, had no other original: & then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For v Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all things were create by the sonne, that he might bear rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might beginne to be the redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he saith, that men should not have had Christ to their king, if he had not beene man. As though the kingdome of God could not stand, if the eternall sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels & men into the fellowship of his heavenly glorie and life, should himselfe beare the soueraignetie. But in this false principle he is alwaies deceiued, or rather de-ceiued himselfe, that the Church should have beene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, even as the Angels enjoyed him their head, he could not likewise by his divine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirtue quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enjoy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Osianter accoueneth for most strong oracles: even so as being drunk with the sweetness of his owne speculations, hee voleth to blowe out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that hee bringeth after, hee saith is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this nowe is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But howe prooueth hee that to be a prophecie? Because in Matthew Christ giueth the same saying to God. As though that whatsoever God hath spoken by men, conteineth some prophecie. Let Osianter seeke prophecies in euery commandement of the lawe, which it is certaine to haue come from GOD the author of them. Beside that, Christ should have beene grosse and earthly, if hee had rested vpon the literal sense. Because hee speaketh not of the mystical unison whereunto he hath vouchfased to receive his church, but only of faith-fulnesse betwene man & wife: for this cause hee teacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shalbe one flesh, that no man shoulde attempt to breake that insoluble knot by divorce. If Osianter loth this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that hee led not his disciples further to a mysterie, in more subtlye expounding the saying of his father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his error, which after he had said that wee are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great mysterie, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure & similitude of mariage to set forth the holy coupling together, that makest vs one with Christ. And so doe the wordes sound. Because when hee giueth warning he speaketh this of Christ & his church, he doth as it were by way of correction, sever the spiritual ioyning of Christ & his Church from the lawe of marriage. Wherefore this fickel reason easilly vaniseth away. And I think:

I neede:
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of

I need no more to shak vp any more of that sort of chaffe, because the vanitie of them all is soone found out by this short confutation. But this sobriety shall abundantly suffice to feede soundly the children of G O D: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the Sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

The xiii. Chapter.

That Christ took uppon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

Nowe, vnlesse I be deceived, it were superfluous to encreaue againe of the Godhead of Christ, which hath alreadie in another place beene proved with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to bee seene, how hee being clothed with our fleshe, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The truth of his humaine nature hath in the olde time beene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom, the Marcionites fained a ghost in stead of the body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that hee had a heavenly fleshe. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture doe stande against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heavenly nature, nor in the counterfeit shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promised to a man made of diete, but to the sonne of Dauid and to the fruite of his wombe. Therefore being delivered in the flesh, hee is called the sonne of Dauid & Abraham; not because he is only borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) hee is according to the fleshe made of the seede of Dauid: as in another place the Apostle teacheth, that he descended of the Jewes. For which cause the Lorde himselfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth ofteentimes call himselfe the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plainly that he was man truely infused of the seede of mankind. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many means, with so great diligence & simplicitie declared a thing not obscure of itselfe, who would have thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet wee have other testimonies at hand, if we lifted to heap vp more of them. As is that saying of Paul; that God sent his sonne made of woman, and innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subject to hunger, thirst, cold, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be choosen, that may most availe to edifie our minde in true confidence. As where it is said that he gaue not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him but toke our nature, that in fleshe & bloud he might, by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Again, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Again, that he ought to have bin made like vs to his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull & faithfull intercessor: that we have not a bishoppe that cannot be compatisant of our infirmities. And such like. And for the same purpose seueth that which wee touched a little before, that it behoved that the finenes of the world should bee cleansed in our flesh: Which Paul plainly affirmeath. And truely, whateuer For the father hath given to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to us, because he is the head, from which the whole body being knit together, growth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the Spirit was given him without measure, that all we should drawe of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater abfurdi-tic then to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidental gift.
And for this cause Christ saith in another place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them.

2. As for the places that they bring forth to confute their errour, they doe too rashly wrest them, and they nothing prevaile by their trifling suttleties, when they go about to wipe away those things that I have alleged for our parte. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastical bodie in stead of a true bodie: because in some places it is said, that he was made after the likeness of a man, and that he was founde in shape as a man. But so he nothing weigheth what is Pauls purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ took up upon him, but that whereas he might have shewed forth his godhead, hee made no other shewe of himselfe, but as of an abject and vnregarded man. For, to shew vs by his example to submission, hee sheweth that forasmuch as hee was God, hee might have by and by set forth his glory to be seen to the world: but yet that hee gave over some of his owne right, and of his owne accorde abased himselfe; because he did put on the image of a servant and contented with that humilitie, suffered his godhead to be hidden with the veil of the flesh. Hee doeth not here teach what Christ was, but howe he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole proceede of the text it is easily gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meane this, that in shape he was founde as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not shine forth, but only the shape of man appeared in base and abject estate? For otherwise that place of Peter coulde not stande together, that hee was dead in the flesh, but quickened in the spirite, if the sone of God had not bene weak in the nature of man: which Paul expresseth more, plainly in saying, that hee suffered by reasaon of the weaknesse of the flesh. And hereunto scruthe the exaltation: because it is expressely faide, that Christ attained a newe glory after that he abased himselfe, which could not well agree to bee spoken of any, but of a man hauling fleshe and soule. Manichees framed Christ a bodie of aire, because Christ is called the seconde Adam, heavenly of heaven. But neither in that place doeth the Apostle bring in a heavenly essence of the bodie, but a spirituall force which being powred abroad by Christ, doth quicken vs. Now, as we haue alreadie seen, Peter and Paul doe sever the same from his flesh.
But rather that doctrine which is receivd among the true teachers, concerning the flesh of Christ, is very well proued by that place. For if Christ had not all one nature of body with vs, it were a very vaine argument, that Paul with such vehemencie followeth: that if Christ bee risen again, we shall also rise again: and if we bee not risen, then that Christ also is not risen. By what cautions so ever either the olde Manichees or their newe Disciples go about to escape, they shall not winde themselves away. It is a soule.
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of

A soul's shift, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sonne of man, in so much as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, verie man in deed is called the sonne of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to be understood by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shall be sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the sonne of man, that thou visitest him? In this figure is expressed the true manhood of Christ. For though he were not immediately begotten of a mortall father, yet his race came from Adam. For else that place could not stande which wee have alreadie alleaged that Christ is made partaker of flesh and bloud, that hee might gather to him yong children to the service of God. In which wordes it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellowe and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning also he faith, that both the author of holinesse & they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is proved by the procee of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowship of nature: because hee by and by addeth, Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if hee had faide before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignitie, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioyne himselfe to the base and vnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they objected, that by this meine the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because we knowe that the children of God are not borne of flesh & bloud, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely flesh the maketh not a brotherly ioyning. But although the Apostle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when wee say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meane which spiritually graffeth vs into the body of Christ. Also they foolishly move a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ should have beene borne of Adam straight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellencie of power. And more colour hath that which they babble, that Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankind into favoure. For, to set out more largely the honor which God vouchsaft to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe set behind vs. And if the testimonie of Moses be well weied, where he faith that the seede of the woman shal breake the serpentes head, it shal utterly end the controwersie. For only Christ is not there spoken of, but all mankind. Because the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, he generally pronounced that the posteritie of the woman should get the upper hand of the diuell. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankind, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Ezech, whom he spake into with good hope, that she should not faint with sorrow.

3. They doe no lesse wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seede of Abraham, and the fruit of
of the wombe of David. For if the name of Seede had bin spoken in an allegorie, truely Paul would not have left it vntrue, where he plainly & without figure affirmeth, that there are not many fones of Abraham reedemers, Gal. 3.18. bur one Christ, Of like fort is it that they alludge: that he is no otherwise called the fonne of David, but because he was promised and at length in his due time delivereth. For after that Paul had once named him the fonne of God: in that hee by and by addeth, According to the flesh, hee truely meaneth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, hee feuerally beside, that according to the flesh hee descended of the Iewes. Nowe if he were not truely begotten of the feede of David, to Rom. 1.3. what purpose shall this saying, that he is the fruite of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loynes shall hee descend, that shall abide in thy feate. Nowe in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Matthew, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though hee doe not reheare the parents of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because hee speake of a thing sufficiently known abroad among the people, he reckeneth it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the fede of David, when it was well known that Marie was of the fame stocke. But Luke more expressteth them in teaching that salvation brought by Christ, is common to all mankinde: because Christ the author of salvation prococeeded from Adam the common parent of all. I grant in deed, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered, Christ was the fonne of David, but in so much as he was begotten of the Virgine. But the new Marcionites to colour their error doe too prouly, in this that to prove that Christ tooke his bodie of nothing, they affirme that women are seedes, and so they overthrowe the principles of nature. But becaufe that is no question of diuinitie, and the reasons that they bring are so fickle that they may verie easily be confuted: therefore I will not touch those things that belong to Philosophie and Phisike, and will hold me contented to wipe away those things that they alledge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioadab tooke wives of the tribe of Iehudah, and so the difference of tribes had then beene confounded, if woman had engendring seede in her. But it is well ynowe known that as touching civill order, the kindreds are reckned by the seede of the man, and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man above woman proueth not the contrarie, but that in generation the seede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckeneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men only: that we therefore say, that the women are nothing: But verie children do know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this sort is said, that women bring forth to their husbands, because the name of the householde alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnnooble, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in the state of bondage, the issue followeth the womb, according to the judgement of the Civill lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is engendred of the seede of the woman, and it hath of long time bin receiv'd in common use of all nations; the mothers are called Genetrices, is engendred. Wherewith Gods law also agreeoth, which else should wrongfully forbid the marriage.

marriage of the vncle with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betweene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marrie his sister by the mothers side, so that she were begotten of another father. But as I grant that there is a passic power ascribed to women, so do I aunswer that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not said to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie making off all shame do too leudly aske, whether we will say, that Christ was engendred of the menstrual seede of the Virgin, for I wil likewise aske of them, whether he did not congele in the blood of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confess. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Maria, he was engendred of her seede: as a like engendring is meant when it is said, that Boaz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgine as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he seuereth this marvellous manner of generation from the common manner, for that by her was Christ begotten of the seede of David. For euen in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of David, and Joseph of Jacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Evangelift so frameth the order of his speach, & willing to prove that Christ came of David, is contented with this one reason, that he was begotten of Maria. Wherby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Maria was of kinne to Joseph.

4 The absurdities wherewith they would charge vs, are stufed ful of childish caullations. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if hee should have taken his original of men: because he so could not be exempt from the vnisetts law that encloseth all the offspring of Adam without exception vnnder sinne. But the comparison that wee reade in Paul doth easily afoile this doubt: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnesse of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also aagreeth another comparison of his: the first Adam of earth earthly, and natural, the second of heauen, heavenly. Therefore in another place, the same Apostle, where he teacheth that Christ was set in the like nesse of sinfull flesh to satisfie the lawe, doth so expressely seuer him from the common estate of men, that he be aie man without fault and corruption. But very childishy they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secrete working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seede of Maria, then is not the womanes seede, but onely the mans seede vnclean. For wee doe not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that hee is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because he is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might bee pure and uncorrupted, such as should have beene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained stedfastly determined with vs, that so oft as the scripture putteh vs in minde of the cleaneenesse of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhood: because it were superfluous to say that God is cleane. Also the sanctification that he speaketh of in the seventeenth of John, could haue no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man.

man is not vnclene or virtuous of itselfe, but accidentall by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocencie was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this vpon vs for an absurditie, that if the Worde of God did put on flesh, then was it inclosed in a narrowe prison of an earthly body; this is but meerly waiwardnasse: because although the infinite essence of the worde did growe together into one person with the nature of man: yet doe we faine no inclosing of it. For the sonne of God descended marvellously from heauen, so as yet he left not heauen, it was his will to bee marvellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to bee conuerstant in earth, & hang vpon the crosse, yet that hee alway filled the worlde euen as at the beginning.

Nowe where it is faide, that the Worde was made flesh: that is not so to be understood, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusely mingled with flesh, but because hee chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by unitie of person. For wee do affirme the godhead joyned and united to the manhood, that either of them have their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fitte, whome wee see to consist of two substances, whereof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the bodie, nor the bodie the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be severallly spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewise of the bodie that thing may bee saide, which can by noe meanes agree with the soule: and that may be said of the whole man, which can be but vnitely taken neither of the soule nor of the bodie severally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the bodie sometime to the soule: and yet he that consists of them is but one man and not many. But such forms of speake doe signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diverse natures which doe make the same person. And so do the Scriptures speake of Christ: sometime they give unto him those things that ought singularly to be referred to his manhood, & sometime those things that do peculiarly belong to his godhead, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them severally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiousnesse express, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the olde authors called Communicating of properties.

1. These things were but weake, vntlesse many phra ses of scripture, and such as be elsewhere ready to finde, did prove that nothing hereof hath bin decided by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himself, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was farre disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what caution the erronious spirits do deprave this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already reveknoven the Redeemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the minds of the godly. But whereas he openly distingught the day of his manifestation from his eternall effence, and of purpose pronounce-tho he himselfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth above Abraham, he doth undoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things kepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glorie with the Father before the creation of the worlde, and that hee worketh together with the father these things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these & such like are peculiarly ascribed to Godhead. But whereas he is called the servant of the Father: and whereas it is said, that he grewe in age, wisedome & favour with God & men: that he seeketh not his owne glorie: that he knoweth not the last day: that he speake th not of himself: that he doth not his owne will: where it is said, that he was seen & felt: this wholly belongeth to his own manhood. For in respect that he is God, neither can he encrease in any thing, & hee worketh all things for his own sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choise of his own will, & can neither be seene nor felt. And yet hee doth not severally ascribe these things to his nature of man only, but taketh them upon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the medi-atour. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul faith, that God did by his owne bloud purchase into him a Church: and the Lord of glorie crucified. Againe, where John faith, that the Word of life was felt.
Truly God neither hath bloud, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But because he which was both verie God & man, Christ being crucified, did shed his bloud for vs: those things that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, & yet not without reason guien to his Godhead. A like example is, where John teacheoth that God gauce his soule for vs: therefore also the property of the manhood is communicat with the other nature.
Againe, when Christ said being yet conversant in earth, that no man haue ascended into heauen, but the sonne of man that was in heauen: true-ly according to his manhood, & in the flesh he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himselfe was both God & man, by reason of the unittie of both natures, he gauce to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all doe these places set forth the true substance of Christ, which do comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in Gospel of him. For which is there red is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhood, but both together, he hath receiued of his father power to forgive sinnes, to raife vp whom he wil, to give righteousnes, holiness & salutation, to be made judge over the quicke & the dead, to be honoured even as the father is: Finally, that hee is called the the light of the world, the good shepheard, the only dove, the true Vine.

For such prerogatives had the sonne of God, when he was shewed in flesh, which although he enjoyed with his father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the same maner or the same respect, & which could not be givn to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the judgement ended, shall yeilde vp the kingdom to God & the father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall have any ending: but euen as hee layd vnder the bosomme of the flesh, & abased himselfe, taking vpon him the form of a servant, & laying aside the port of majestie, hee shewed himselfe obedient to his father, & having perforned all such subjection, as length is crowned with honor & glorie, & auanced to the highest dominion, that all knees that bow before him: to that he then yeilde vp to his father both that name & crown of glorie, & whatsoever he hath receivd of his father, that God may be al in al. For to what purpose is power & dominion given him, but that the father shoulde govern vs by his hande? In which sense it is also said, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, till we may enjoy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they took no heed to the person of the Mediator, haue obscured the natural meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the gospel of John, & haue entangled themselves in many snares. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right understanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shall reigne till hee come forth to judge the world, in so much as hee joyneth vs to his father, according to the final measure of our weakenes. But when wee being made partakers of the heavenly glory, shall see God such as he is, then hee having perforned the office of Mediator, shall ceaseth to be the embassador of his father, & shall be contented with that glorie which hee enjoyed before the making of the world. And the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the mean degree betweene God & vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whose are all things, & one Lord, by whom all things are, even he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntil his dominion to be seen face to face. From whom so farre is it off that any thing shal decay, by yeielding vp the dominion to his father, that hee shall become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also ceaseth to be the head of Christ because Christes godhead shall then shine in itselfe, whereas yet it is covered with a certaine veil.

youre reverence, as they ought to be. But there is nothing that those furious and phantastike spirits trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the Godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his Godhead, to take away his manhood: and of those things that are jointly spoken of both natures, that they severally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man & God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God & man, consisting of both natures, united, though not confounded, is our Lord & the true Sonne of God, even according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driven farre away from vs, which when he went about rather to drawe in sundrers, than to distinguish the nature, did by the meanes imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture crieth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the Sonne of God is given to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin herselfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madness of Eutiches, least while we go about to shewe the vnitic of the person, we destroy either nature. For we have already alledged so many testimonies, & there are every where so many other to be alledged, where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood, as may stop the mouths even of most contentious. And a little hereafter I will alledge some testimonies, to confute better that sained deuise, but at this present, one place shall content vs. Christ would not have called his body a Temple, vnlesse the godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the Synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon; forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunders.

In our age also there hath risen vp no leesse pestilent a monster, Michael Servetus, which did thrust in place of the Sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements. But first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the Sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his subtletie, that the distinction of the two natures being once overthrown, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God & man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole processe he travaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were only certain shadowes in figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that worde which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the Sonne of God. And we in deed do confess that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the Sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the reuerse of the inestimable favour of God, vnlesse this dignitie were given him to be, & be called the only begotten Sonne. But in the meanes season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is counted the Sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worlds, did by hypostatically union take upon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall

...union is called with the old fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was devised to overthrow the doting error of \textit{Ne\ssius}, because he fained that \textit{sonne} of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. \textit{Sermessius} slandereth vs, that we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Word was alreadie the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurd is it to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to \textit{Marie} do secretely shew, That holy thing that shalbe borne of thee, shall be called the sonne of God; as if he should have said, that the name of the sonne which was obscure in time of the law, should now become famous & euer where knownen abroad. Wherewith agreeeth that saying of \textit{Paul}, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely & with boldnesse to cries \textit{Abba}, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the old time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, & bearing them bold upon that interest, they called upon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heavenly fatherhood is become more plainly known, therefore \textit{Paul} signifieth this, as it were, a privilege to the kingdom of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, that God never was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their own wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why \textit{Sermessius} should cauil, that this hangeth upon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined with himself, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beasts: but because they could not in deed be the children of God, unleffe their adoption were grounded uppon the head, it is without reason to take y from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignitie did not hang upon the redemption to come: yet must it needs be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I wil repeate it againe shortly, & adde the fame of mankinde. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of \textit{Paul} be true, that Christ was alway the head & y first begotten of all creatures, to \textit{Col.} 1, 15. have the first degree in all. I think I do rightly gather that hee was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. \textit{Sermessius} & other such franticke men would have it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Now let them aunswer mee whether he be the sonne according to both natures, & in respect of both. So in deed they prate, but \textit{Paul} teacheth farre otherwise. Woe graunt in deed, that Christ is in the Christ truly & properly the sonne of God in the flesh, but not in respect of the flesh, which before he took up & was the sonne.

the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption only & grace, but the true & natural, & therefore only Sonne, by this mark he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchsafeth to give the name of his Sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true & only begotten Sonne, he giveth to Christ only. How can he be the only Sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which wee have received by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truly & properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, & offered himself for sacrifice to his father upon the crose: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he faith, he was set out to preach the gospel of God, which he had before promised of his Sonne, which was begotten of the seed of David according to his flesh, & declared the Sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the Sonne of David according to the flesh, should he generally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, whilst he meant to shewe that this did hang upon some other thing, than upon the verie flesh? For in the same sense in another place he faith, that he suffered by the weakness of the flesh, & rose againe by the power of the spirit, even so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truely they must needs grant, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the Sonne of David, so he hath that of his father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is another thing & severall from the nature of man. The Scripture giveth him two names, calling him here and there sometimes the Sonne of God, & sometimes the Sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moved: but according to the common use of the Hebree tongue he is called the Sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam.

By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead & eternall essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Sonne of man. Againe, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seed of David, was no otherwife declared the Sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Lewes, is God blessed for ever. Now if both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the Sonne of man, is not also the Sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

They do indeed disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, y God spared not his own Sonne, & where the Angel commanded, that the verie same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the Sonne of the highest. But, least they should glory in to fickle an objection, let them wew with vs a little, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he that is conceived is called the Sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because John faith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his handes haue handeled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet:

"Thou
Thou Bethlehem in the land of Juda, art a little one in thousandes of Juda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his comming forth from the beginning, from the dates of eternity. Howe will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to followe such manner of reasoning: For I haue professed, that we do not agree with Ne- storius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the Sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conoyning, because he is the onely begotten Sonne of God in the flesh which he took of vs. And Augustine doth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to behold the maruious and singular favour of God, that hee attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserve. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency euyn according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the Sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vniue of person to be saine such a mixture, as may take away which is proper to the godhead For it is no more absurdity, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures united into one person, be divers ways called the Sonne of God, than that hee bee according to divers respectes, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the Sonne of man. And no more doeth that other caullation of Serenus accesomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the descerning of him then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already cleerely proved that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the worde begotten of the eternal father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which hee hath taken upon him, but because he is God openly swed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not beene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutual relation to the Sonne, by whom all kinde or fatherhood is reckoned in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euyn in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, he was the Son of God, before that this name was commonly known in the Churche. But if they striue only about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to bee incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (faith he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentions this testimonie will not bee of sufficient force: neither do I much grudge upon it, sauing that it sheweth that they do maliciously cail, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the olde writers with one mouth and consent have openly testifid the same: so that their shamelesse is no lesse worthy to be scorned then to be abhorred which dare obiect Irenus and Tertullian against vs, both which do confesse that the Sonne of God was invisiable, which afterward appeard visible.

8 But although Serenus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuises, which peradventure the other would not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to bee the Son of God but in the flesh, doe grant it only in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as, the Machabees...
Of the knowledge of

In olden times did foolishly affirm, that man hath his soul (as it were) by derivation from God, because they read that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast holde of the name of Sonne, that they leave no difference betwixt the natures, but babble disorderly, that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisedome, that Solomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantastical Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhood. It were indeed profitable to confute the groser deceites of Sermecius, where-with he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the end that the godly readers admonished by this example, may holde themselves within the copse of soberneffe and modestie: saying that I think it should be superfluous, because I have already done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and even then hee was before appointed to bee man that should be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other Word of God, but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time hee confoundeth the Spirit with the Worde, for that God distributed the invisible Word and the Spirit into flesh & soul. Finally the figuratio of Christ, with them the place of begetting, but hee faith, that hee which then was but a shadow of the Sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the worde, to which he assigneth the office of seed, Whereby it shall follow that hoggess and dogges are as well the children of God, because they were create of the original seede of the worde of God. For although hee compoundeth Christ of three vncreate elementes to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faineth that hee is to the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And lest he shoulde seeme to stripe Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is confubstantiall with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the flesh into God, So while he cannot conceive Christ to be the Son of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Worde to nothing, and taketh from vs the sonne of David, that was promised to be the Redeemer.

He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God, by knowledge and predestination, & that at first he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elementes, which afterward appeared in the first light of the worde, in the cloud and in the pillar of fire. Nowe howe shamefully hee sometime disagreeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that have their sound witte may gather, that with the circumstances of this vnclidean dog the hope of saluation is utterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the godhead it selfe, it should cease to bee the temple thereof. And none can be our redeemer, but he that begotten of the seede of Abraham and David, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And hee wrongfully standeth upon the wordes of John, that the Worde was made flesh. For as they restit the the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked invention, whereby Eustiches was author, forasmuch as the only purpose of the Evangelist was to defend the virtue of persons in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That vwe may know, so what ende Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought vis: three things are principally to be considered in him, his Prophetical office, his kingdom, and his Priesthood.

Augustine saith rightly, that although the Heretikas doth brag of the name of Christ, yet they have not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onlie proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be founde among them onlie in name, and not in verie deed. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the world, founde in their mouth; yet because being contented with vaine pretence of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul maie bee well spoken of them, that they have not the head. Therefore, that faith maie finde sound matter of salvation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to bee stablished, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes: For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, & a Priest. Albeit, it were but small profit to know those names, without knowledge of the ende of the same of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profit, where it is not known what ech of these titles containeth in it. We have saide before, how, though God sending Prophets by continual course one after another, did never leave his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient for salvation: that yet the minde of the godly hath all way this persuasion, that full light of understanding was to be hoped for only at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euene to the Samaritane, who yet never knewe the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias commeth he shall teach vs all things. And the Jews had not rashly gathered this upon presumptions in their minde: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleued. Notable among the other is that saying of Esaie. Beholde, I haue made him a witness to peoples, I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaster to peoples: euene as in another place he had called him the Angel or Interpreter of the great counsell. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the gospel, after that he had saide that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diversely, and vnder manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloved Sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to keep the Church in suspense, & to uphold it vnitl the comming of the Mediator, there fore we read that in their scattering abroad, the faithful complained that they were deprived of that ordinarily benefit, saying: We see not our tokens: there is not a prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But wha Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to seale vp the vision and the Prophecy, not onely that the Prophecy, which is there spoken of, should bee stablished in assured credit, credit, but also that the faithful should learn with a contented mind to wait the Prophets for a time, because the fulness and closing up of all revelations was at hand.
Cap. 15. Of the knowledge of

2. Now it is to be noted, that the title of condemnation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the law, as well the Prophets as Priests and kings were annointed with holy unction. For which cause the renowned name of Messiah was given to the promised Mediator. But though indeed I confesse (as I have also declared in another place,) that he was called Messiah, by peculiar consideration & respect of his kingdom; yet the annointings in respect of the office of Prophet & of Priest, have their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expressly mentioned in Esaias, in these words: The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah upon me. Therefore the Lord hath annointed me, that I should preach to the meek, should bring health to the contrite in heart, should declare deliverance to captives, should publish the yere of good will, &c. We see he was annointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witness of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner; for he is seuered from other teachers that had the like office. And here again is to be noted, that he took not the anointing for himselfe alone, that hee might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole body, that in his continual preaching of the Gospel, the virtue of the Spirit should be joyne withall. But in the mean time this remaineth certaine, by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an end is made of all prophecies. So that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospel, doe patch any foreign thing vnto it. For that vowe which thunders from heaven, saying: This is my beloved Sonne, hear him: hath advancd him: by singular priuilege above the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is poured abroad from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Joel.

Your children shal prophesie, and your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was given vs vnto wisdom, and in another place, y in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge & understanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceive what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitesimall of heavenlie good things. For which cause he wrieth in another place, I have counted it precious to know nothing, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospell. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that wee might know that in the summe of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisedom.

3. Now come I to his kingdom, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature therof is spiritual. For thereby is gathered both to what purpose is serueth, and what it availeth vs, & the whole force and eternitie therof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angel doeth attribute to the person of Christ, and againe the Angell in Luke doeth worthilie applie to the salvation of the people. But that is also double or of two forces, for the one belongeth to the whole body of the Church, the other is proper to every member. To the first is to be referred that which is saied in the psalme: I have once sworn by my holiness to Psa. 89. 36. David, I will not lie, his seed shall abide for ever, his seed shall be as the Sunne in my fight, it shall be establishd as the Moon for ever, and a faithful-witnesse in heaven. Neither is it doubtful, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his sonne an eternall governour and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophesie can be founde no where else but in Christ; forasmuch as immediatlie after his death of Solomon, the greater part of the dignities of the kingdome fell awaye, and was to the dishonour of the house of David conveyed over to a private man, and afterward by little and little was diminished, til at length it came to utter decay, with heavy & shameful destruction. And the same meaning hath the exclamation of Esai: Who shall shew forth his generation? For hee so pronounced in Christ shall remaine alive after death, that hee ioyneith him with his members. Therefore so oft as wee heare that Christ is armed with eternall power, let vs remember that the everlafling continuance of the Church is upheld in this supporter, to remaine still safe among the troublesome toffinges, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grievous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when David scorneth the boldness of his enemies, that go about to break the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kinges and peoples raged in vaine, because hee that dwelleth in heaven is strong enough to break their violent assaults: he assureth the godlie of the continual preservation of the Church, & encourageth them to hope well so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when hee saith in the person of God: Sit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool: hee warnceth vs, that how many and strong enemies doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to prevaile against that vnchangeable decree of God, wherby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the world, maie bee able at any time to destroy the Church, which is grounded upon the eternall seat of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the special use of euerie one, the very same eternall continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we see, that what soever is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heaven, pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when anie of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spiritual, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pierce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is now defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full fruite of this grace in the world to come.

4. That, as we have saide, the force and profit of the kingdom of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived by vs, but when wee know it to be spiritual, appeareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must liue in warfare vnder the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is harde and miserable: what then should it profit vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenlie king, vnlesse we were certaine to enjoy the
Cap. 15. Of the knowledge of the fruit of whatsoever felicity is promised in Christ, and that which is the outward commodities, that you should lead a merrie and quiet life, also doth enrich his with all things necessary to eternall salvation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength, by which they may stande invincible against all assaults of principal enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs than for himselfe, and that both within and without, that being furnished, so farre as God knoweth to bee expedient for vs, with the gifts of the spirit, whereas we are naturally emptie, we may by these first fruits perceive that we are truely joyned to God vnto perfect blessednesse. And then, that bearing vs boldly vpon the power of the same spirit, we may not doubt that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Diuell, the worlde, and euerie kinde of hurftfull thing. To this purpose tendeth the answere of Christ to the Pharisees, that because the kingdom of God is within vs, it shall not come with observation. For it is likely that because he prophesied that he was the same king, under whom the soueraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in feorne required him to shewe forth his signes. But hee, because they (who otherwife are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest vpon worldly pomps, biddeth them to enter into their own confusions, because the kingdom of God is righteousness, peace & joy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdom of Christ availeth vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subject to corruption, but spirituall: he lifteth vs vp euen to eternall life, that we may patiently passe ouer this life in miseries, hunger, cold, contempt, reproches, and other griefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will never leave us destitute, but succour vs in our necessities, till having ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his manner of reigning, to communicate with vs at that he hath receiv'd of his father. Now whereas he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnissheth vs with beauty & magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministr'd vs most plentiful matter to glorifie vs, & also bolde courage to fight without feare against the Diuell, famine and death. Finally, that clothe with his righteousness, we may valiantly overcome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally filleth vs with his gifts, so we again for our part, may bring forth fruit to his glory.

Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vs, not done with oils or ointments made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God because upon him hath resteth the spirit of wisedome, understanding, counsell, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalme reporteth that he was anointed above his fellowes, because if there were not such excellency in him, we should be al needie and hungry. For, as it is already saide, he is not privately enriched for himselfe, but to poure his plentie plenteous upon vs, being hungry and dry. For as it is said, that the father gave the spirit to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all we should receive of his fulness, and grace for grace. Out of which saucetainesoweth that liberal givings, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is diversely distributed to the faithful, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I said sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdom of Christ consisteth in the spirit, not in earthly delights or pompes, and therefore we must forsake the world that we may bee partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptism of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested vpom him in the likeness of a dove. That the holy Ghost and his gifts are meant by the word Anointing, ought to seeme neither nouellie nor aburruditie. For we are none other way quickened, specially for so much as concerneth the heavenly life: there is no dropp of lively force in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his seat in Christ, that from thence the heavenly riches might largely owle ownto, whereof we are so needie. And whereas both the fairhull stand indinciue by the strength of their king, and also his spirituall riches plenteiously owle out vnto them, they are not vnworthely called Christianes. But this eternitie whereof we have spoken is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then he shall yeeld vs the kingdom to God and the Father. Againe: the sonne himself shall bee made suject, that God maie bee all in all things: for his meaning is nothing else, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingdom shall not bee such as it is nowe. For the father hath giuen all power to the sonne, that by the sonnes hande he may gouerne, cherish and sustaine vs, defend vs under his safegarde, and helpe vs. Sowhile for a little time wee are wauering abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and vs, by little and little to bring vs to perfect conioynge with God. And truely, whereas he sitteth on the right hande of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the fathers deputie, vnder whom is the whole power of his dominion, because it is Gods will to rule and defende his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expounde it in the first chapter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hande of the father, to be the head of the Church, which is his bodie. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is giuen him a name above all names, that in the name of Jesus all kneess should bow, and all tongues confession he is to the glorie of God the Father. For even in the same woordes also he setteth out in the kingdom of Christ an order necessarie for our present weakenesse. So Paul gathereth right- ly, that God shall then be by himselfe the only head of the Church, because Christes office in defending of the Church, shall bee fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, because his Father did sette him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lordely power by him. For though there bee manie Lordeshippes in the world, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whom are all thinges and wee in him, and one Lorde Christ, by whom are all thinges and we by him sayeth Paul: Whereupon is rightly gathered that hee is the selfe same God, which by the

the mouth of Esaiie affirmed himselfe to bee the king and the lawe maker of the Church. For though he do euer where call al the power that he hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God; because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediator, that descending from the bosom & incomprehensible glorie of the father, he might approximate unto vs. And so much more rightful it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, & that with great cherefulnesse we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he ioyneth the offices of king and pastor toward them that willingly yeeld them selves obedient; so on the other side, we heare that bee beareth an yron scepter, to breake and bruise all the obstinate like potters vesseles: wee heare also that he shalbe the judge of nations, to ouerthrowe the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples scene at this day: but the full profe thereof shalbe at the last judgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holde, that the end and yse of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spotte, that should by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entrie, and God according to his office of judge is bent against vs, it is necessary that some expiation bee vse, that he being a priest may procure faueour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoved that he should come forth with a sacrifice. For in the lawe it was not lawfull for the priest to enter into the sanctuarie without blood, that the faithfull might knowe, that though there were a priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Upon which point the A-pistle discourseth largely in the epistle to the Hebrewes, from the fourt chapter almost to the ende of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of priesthoode can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrificse of his death hath wiped away our giltnes, and satisfied for our sinnes. But howe weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemn ooth of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establishe that principal point, which he knewe to bee the chiefioynete whereupon our saluation hanged. For, as it is saide, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the priestes do sanctifie vs and obtain grace for vs, from which the vnclannesse of our wicked doinges and sinnes doth debare vs. So doe we see, that we must beginne at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profite of his priesthoode may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that hee is an eternonal intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine faueour, whereupon againe artifeth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godlie consciences, while they safely lean upon the fatherly tendernesse of God, and are certainly perswaded that it pleafeth him whatsoeuer is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the lawe, God commandeth sacrifices of beatles to be offered to him:there was an other and a newe order in Christ

God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 161

Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the priest: because there neither could be found anie other satisfaction for sins, nor any was worthie so great honour to offer vp to God his onelie begotten Sonne. Nowe Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father favorable and mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the felowship of so great an honour. For wee that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priests in him doe offer vp our selues, & all our to God, and doe freely enter into the heauenlie sanctuarie, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, maye bee acceptable and sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre dooth that laying of Christ extendeth: For their sakes I sanctifie myselfe: because, haung his holinesse powerd vpon vs, in as much as hee hath offered vs with himselfe to his father, wee that otherwise doe sinke before him, doe please him as pure & cleane, yea & holy. Hereunto seruereth the anointing of the sanctuarie, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the comparison of contrariety is to be noted betwene this anointing, and that shadow of anointing that the was in vce: as if the Angell should haue saide, that the shadowes being driven away, there should bee a cleere priesthood in the person of Christ. And so much more determable is their invention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, have presumed to thrust in themselves to kill him: which is daily enterprised among the Papistes, where the Masse is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvi. Chapter.

Houe Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase salvation for vs; Vvherein is intreated of his death, and Resurrection and his Ascending into Heauen.

Al that we have hitherto saide of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, wee maie secke for righteousness, deliverance, life and salvation in him; as we be taught by that notable sayinge of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen given to men wherein they must be saved. Neither was the name of Jesus given him vnadvisedly, or at chaunceable adventure, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angel the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned, because he was sent to saue the people from their sins. In which words ye is to be noted, which we have touched in another place, ye the office of redeemer was appointed him, ye he should be our Saviour: but in the same time our redemption should be but vnperfect, vnles he should by continual proceedings conuey vs forward to the verymost marke of salvation. Therefore, so soon as we swarme nearer so little from him, our salvation by little & little vanisheth away, which wholly resteth in him: so ye all they wilfully spoile the selues of al grace, ye rest not in him. And ye admonition of Bernard is worthie to be rehearsed, that the name of Jesus is not only light, but also meat, yea & oille also, without which all the meat of the soule is drye, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is unsavourie. Finally, that it is honye in the mouth, melodie in the ear and joyfulnesse in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputations is vnfauitie, but where this name foundeth. But here it behoueth to weigh diligently how salvation is purchased by him for vs: that wee may not onely bee persuaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the steadfast vpholdynge of our faith, wee maie refuse all such things as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For sicke no man can descende into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demandeth satisfaction: there is no common assuir'dnesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alway vppon sinners, till they bee loose from their guiltinesse: who, as he is a righteous judge, suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to revenge it.

2 But before we goe anie further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which prevented vs with his mercie, was our enemie vs till he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For howe could he have giuen vs in his onely begotten sonne a singular pledge of his love, unlees he had alreadie before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first yndoe this knotte. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enemie to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were seuered from God, till they were received into a conioyning by his bodie. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that wee maie the better understand howe miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse wordes, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and everlastinge death did rest upon vs, wee woulde lesse acknowledge howe miserable wee should bee without Gods mercie, and woulde lesse regard the benefite of deliuerance. As for example. If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at suche time as thou waft yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserted, thou shouldest have suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath willingly and of his owne free kindnesse kepte thee in fauour, and not suffered thee to be estranged from him, hee hath so deliuered thee from that terrifie truly hee will bee moveing with, and in some part feel howe much hee oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that he was by sinne estranged from God, the heire of wrath, subject to the curse of eternal death, excluded from all hope of salvation, a stranger from all blessing of God, the bondslave of Satan, captuie under the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordained vnto and alreadie entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreate for him, that Christ tooke vs upon him and suffered the punishment which by the just judgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that hee hath purged with his blood those evilis that made them hatefull to God, that by this expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace between God and men: that upon this bonde is conteined his good will towards them: shall not he be so much the more moved with these, as it is more liuely represented, out of howe great miserie he hath ben ne deliuered? In a fumme: because our minde can neither defirously enoue take hold of life in the mercie of God, nor receive it with such thankfulness as wee ought, but when it is before friken and throwne downe with the fearce of the wrath of God and dread of eternal death, we are so taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ wee may fee God in manner wrathful ley bent against vs, and his hand armed to our destruccion, and that we may embrace his good will & fatherly kindnesse no otherwere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weakenesse of our ca-pacitie, yet it is not falsely fayde. For God which is the highest righteou-nesse, can not loue wickednesse, which hee seeth in vs all. Therefore we all have in vs that, which is woorthie of the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truly we are all in displeasure of God, guilttie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not loafe that which is his in vs, hee fin-deth yet somewhat that hee of his goodnesse may loue. For howfouer wee be finneres by our owne fault, yet wee remaine his creatures. Howfouer wee have purchased death to our soules, yet wee made vs vnto life. So is he moued by meere and free louing of vs to receive vs into favoure. But sith there is a perpetuall and vnappleable disagreement betweene righteou-nesse and iniquitie, so long as wee remaine finneres, hee cannot receive vs wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholly reconcile vs vnto him, hee doth by expiation setforth in the death of Christ, take away whatfoever euill is in vs, that wee, which before were uncleane and vnpure, maye nowe appeare righteous and holye in his sight. Therefore God the Father doeth with his loue preuent and go before our reconcilliation in Christ, yea, because hee first loued vs, therefore hee afterwarde doth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But because vntrill Christ with his death come to succour vs, there remaineth wickednes in vs, which deferseth Gods indignation, and is accurfed and damned in his sight, therfore we are not fully and familie ioyned to God, vntrill Christ doth ioyne vs.

Therefore if we will assure our felues to haue God made well pleased and favourable vnto vs, wee must fasten our eyes and minde vpon Christ one-ly: as indeed we obteine by him onely, that our finneres be not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paul faith, that the same loue, wherewith GOD embraced vs before the creation of the world, was stayed and grounded vpon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the Scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accorde verie well together, where it is twide: that God declared his loue towarde vs in this, that hee gave his onely begotten fonne to death: and yet that he was our enemie till he was made fauourable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly proued to them that require the testament of the old Church that wee doe. The loue of God (faith he) is incomprehensible and vnchangeable

\textbf{God the Redeemer. Lib.2. 162}

geable. For he beganne not to love vs, since the time that wee were reconciled to him by the blood of his sonne. But before the making of the worlde hee loued vs, even before that we were anie thing at all, that wee might also bee his children with his onely begotten sonne. Therefore whereas wee are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the sonne did therefore reconcile vs vnto him, that hee might nowe beginne to loue vs whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that alreadie loued vs, to whom we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I telle, let the Apostle beare witnesse. Hee doth commend (laith hee) his loue toward vs, because when wee were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. Hee therefore had a love to vs, euen then when wee were enemies to him & wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a manuellous and diuine manner hee loued vs, euen then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednes had on eueri side wafted away his worke, he knew how in curie one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to loue that which hee had made. These be the wordes of Augustine.

5 Nowe where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betwene vs and God, and purchaseth such righteousness as might make him fauourable & well willing toward vs, it may be generally answered, yee he hath brought it to passe by yee whole course of his obedience. Which is proved by the testimony of Paul. As by one mos office, many were made sinners, so by one mos obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth ye cause of the pardon that delivereth vs from the curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ, saiesing; When the fulnes of time was come, God sent his son made of a woman, subject to the law, to redeeme them, when he was under the law: And so affirmed ye, in his very baptism was fulfilled one part of righteousness, that he obediently did the commandement of his father. Finally, from the time that hee tooke upon him the person of a servant, he began to pay the raunsume to redeeme vs. But the Scripture to set out the manner of our saluation more certainly, doth ascrie this as particul and properly belonging to the death of Christ. Hee himself pronounceth that he gaue his life to be a redemption for many. Paul teacheth that he died for our sins. John Baptist cried out ye Christ came to take away the sins of the world, because he was the Lamb of God. In another place Paul saith, that we are justified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his own blood. Againe, that we are justified in his blood and reconciled by his death. Againe, hee that knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be infinit, and many of them must be hereafter all cadged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beleefe, which they call the Apostles creede, it is very orderly passed immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehended it wholly from the beginning to the end in saying, that hee abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient to his father to death.
death, even the death of the cross. And truly even in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, unless it had been willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousness. Therefore, where the Lord testified, that he gave his soul for his sheep, he expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. According to the which meaning, Eph 5:2, faith, that he held his peace like a lamb before the shorer. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went forth and met the soldiery, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeeld himselfe to judgement to be pronounced upon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities upon him, & it behoved that his obedience to his father, shoulde be this wise tried. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable love towards vs, to wrastle with horrible feare, and in the midst of these cruel torments to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might provide for vs. And this is to be believed, that there could no sacrifice be well offered to God anie otherwise, but by this that Christ for taking all his owne affection, did submit & wholly yeeld himselfe to his fathers will. For proofe whereof, the Apostle doth fully alledge that testimonie of the Psalme: in the booke of the lawe it is written of mee, that I may doe thy will, O God, I will, and thy law is in the midst of my heart. Then I said: Lect, I come. But because trembling confidences finding no rest but in a sacrifice & washing whereby sins are cleansed; therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due vnto vs, before the heauenly judgement seat of God, therefore first of all is recited howe he was condemned before Ponce Pilate president of Iudie: that we should know that the punishment whereunto we were subject, was justly laide vpon vs. We could not escape the dreadfull judgement of God: Christ, to deliuer vs from it, suffred himselfe to bee condemned before a mortal man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the president is expressed not onely to procure credite to the historie, but that we should learn that which Eph 5:2 teacheth, that that chastisement of our peace was vpon him, and that by his stripes we were healed. For to take away our damnation, every kinde of death suffred not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to bee chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltiness vpon himselfe, hee might deliuer vs from them both. If hee had beene murthered by thecues, or had beene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the common people: in suche a death there shoulde haue beene no apperance of satisfaction. But when hee was brought to be arraigned before the judgement seate, when hee was accused and pressed with witnesses against him, and was by the mouth of the judge condemned to die: by these tokens wee understand, that hee did bear the person of a guiltie man, and of an euill doer. And here are two things to bee noted, which both were afore spoken by the prophecies of the Prophetes, and doe bring a singular comforte and confirmation of Fayth. For when wee heare that Chrifte was sent from the judges seate to death, and was hanged among thecues, we haue the fulfilling of that prophecie which is al ledged by the Evangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? euen to take vpon him the steepe of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because hee suffered death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when wee heare that hee was acquitted by the same mouth whereby hee was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more then once to beare witness of his innocencie: let that come in our mind which is in the other prophet: that he reaped that which he had not taken awaie. And so wee shall beholde the person of a sinner and euid doer represented in Chrift: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. He suffered therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the solemn sentence of the President, was reckoned in the number of wicked doers: but yet not so, but he was by the same judge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittall, that the guiltinesse which made vs subiect to punishment, is remoued vpon the heade of the Sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, wee ought principally to holde fast, least wee tremble and bee carefull all our life long, as though the just vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the Sonne of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

6 Beside that, the verie manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accursed, not onely by opinion of men, but also by decree of the lawe of God. Therefore when Chrift was lifted vp to the Crosse, hee made himselfe subject to the curse. And so it behooved to bee done, that when the curse was removed from vs to him, we might bee delivered from all curse that for our sinnes was prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadowe expressed in the lawe. For the sacrifices & satisfactorie oblations that were offered for sinnes, were called Asermoth. Which worde properly signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figurative chaunge of name, the holie Ghost meant to shew, that they were like unto cleansing plaisters to draw out to themselues, and beeare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Mojes, is indeede deliuered in Chrift the original patern of all the figures. Wherefore hee to performe a perfect expiation, gave his owne soule to be an ansham, that is a satisfactorie oblation as the Prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might bee cast, and so ceaze to bee imputed to vs. The Apostle telesieth the same thing more plainly, where he teacheth, that hee which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that wee might bee made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the son of God being most cleane from all faults, did yet put vpon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side covered vs with his cleannesse. It seemeth that hee meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was removed, and laide vpon the sinnhe of Chrift. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Chrift was in his death offered vp to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, wee might cease to dread the the wrath of God. Nowe is it plaine, what that saying of the Prophet mea-neth, that the iniquities of vs all were laid upon him, that is, that he enten-ding to wipe away the filthineffe of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of entarched imputation, covered with them. Of this, the crosse whereunto hee was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (fait he) redeemed vs from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where hee teacheth that Christ did beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Because by the verie token of the curse wee doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid vpon him. And yet it is not so to be understood, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was overloden, but rather that in taking it vpon him, he did trecde downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueh acquittall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doeth not without a cause honourably report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph.

For he saith, that the hande writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the Princely powers were spoyled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternall spirit, And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be thoroughly setled in our hearts, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing.
For wee could not certainly beleue that Christ was the ransom, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had beene a sacrificed hoste, And therefore there is so often mention made of blood, where the Scripture sheweth the manner of our redeeming. Albeit the blood of Christ that was shedde, ser-ued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steele of washing, to cleanse away our silthineffe.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where again it is to be seene, howe he did suuerie where put himselfe in our stead, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held vs bounde vnder his yoke. Christ in our stead did yeeede himselfe into the power of death, to deliver vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that wee should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs. But in this he differed fro vs, that he gave himselfe to death, as it were to bee devoured, not that hee should be swallowed vp with the gullves of it, but rather that hee should swal-lowe vp it, of which we should have beene presently swallowed: that hee gave himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with power thereof, but rather that hee should overthrowe death which approcheth neece vs, yea, and had alreadie beaten vs downe and triumphed vpoun vs.
Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuell, and might deliver them that by fear of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of himselfe with vs, hee mor-tisfith

ifeth our earthie members, that they should no more hereafter use their owne works: and killeth our olde man, that it should no more live & bear fruites. And to the same purpose pertaineth his burial, that wee being partakers thereof, should also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle teacheth that we are grazed into the likeness of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his crose the world was crucified to vs, and wee to the world, that wee are dead together with him, hee doeth not onelie exhorte vs to express the example of Christes death, but hee declareth that there is such effectuallness in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, vnlesse they will make his death unprofitable and fruitlesse. Therefore in the death and burial of Christ, there is offered vs a double benefit, to bee enioyed, that is deliverance from death, whereunto wee were become bonde, and the mortifying of our flesh.

8 But it is not meete to ouerpass his going downe to the helles, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the olde fathers, that that parte which is read in the Creed was not in olde time so much vsed in the Churches: yet in entreatyng of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a verie profitable and not to bee despised mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that doe not leave it out. Whereby wee make gesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by little & little grewe in vs in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common judgement of all the godlie: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe to the helles, although after diuerse maner of exposition. But by whome, or at what time it was first added, makest little to the purpose. But rather in the Creed he this is to be taken heed euery, that we there in certainly have a full and in all pointes perfect summe of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thrust, but that which is taken out of the most pure worde of God. Nowe, if anye will not for precise curiositie admit it into the Creed, yet shall it straight way be made to appeare plainly, that it is of so great importance to the summe of our redemption, that if it bee left out, there is lost a great parte of the fruites of the death of Christ. There are againe some that thinke, that there is no newe thing spoken in this article, but that in other wordes the same thing is repeated which was spoken before of his burial: for as much as the word Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture often times vsed for the graue. I grant that to bee true which they allcage of the signification of the worde, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue: but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily perswaded to dissent from them. For what an idlenesse were it, when a thing not harde to understand hath once beene set out in playne & easie worde, afterward with darker implication of worde, rather to point toward it than to declare it. For when two manners of speaking that express one thing bee joyned together, it behoveth that the later bee an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should... say thus: Whereas it is said that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went down to hell. Again, it is not likely that such a superfluous vain repetition could have crept into this abridgment, wherein the chief points of our faith are summarily noted in as fewe words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall have somewhat diligently weyed the matter it self, will easily agree with me.

Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the law, to carry them tidings that the redemption was performed, and to deliver them out of the prifon, wherein they were kept inclosed: & to the proofe hereof they do wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalme, that hee brake the brazen gates and yron barres. Againe, out of Zacharie, that hee redeemed them that were bounde, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalme speakes of their deliverances, in farre countries are cast captiue into bonds, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonical overthowe, wherein the people was oppressed, to a drie pit or bottomlesse deapth, and therewithall teacheth that the salvation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepe helles: I wot not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place vnder the earth whereunto they haue fained the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day many doe earnestly defende it for a truthe; is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to enclose the soules of dead men as in a prifon, is verie childish. And what neede was it that Christes soule shoule goe downe thither to set them at libertie? I do in deed willingly confesse, that Christ thined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might knowe that the grace which they had only tafted of by hope, was then delivered to the worlde. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where hee faith, that Christ came and preached to the spirites that were in a dungeon or prifon, as it is commonly translated. For the verie proceffe of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth thereby amplifie the force of Christes death, for that it pearced eu'n to the dead, when the godly soules enjoyed the present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all salvation. But whereas Peter in his saying makeeth no distinction betweene them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but only he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

But concerning Christes going down to the hell, beside the consideration of the Creede, wee must secke for a more certaine expostion, and wee assuredly have such a one out of the word of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death had bin to no effect, if he had suffered only a corporal death: but it behooved also, that he should feel the rigor of Gods vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath and satisfy his iust judgement. For which cause also it behooved that he should as it were hande to hande wretelle with the armies of the helles and the horror

By his descendeing intio hel, his feeling the rigor of Gods vengeance & by wrestling in soule. with infernall horror might be understand.
Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of of eternall death. Wee haue euene nowe alleged out of the Prophet that the chastiment of our peace was layde vpon him: that hee was striken of his father for our sinnes, and brouched for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the stead of wicked doers, as surety and pledge, yea, & as the verie guiltie person himselfe, to abide & sufferr all the punishmentes that should haue beene laide vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be helden st ill of the forrowes of death. Therefore it is no maruatil if it be said that he went down to the helles, & the suffered that death wherewith GOD in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very found, yea and to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is perverted, because it were an absurditie to set that after his buriall which goe before it. For after the setting forth of those things that Christ suffert in the fight of men, in very good order followeth that inuisible and incapable judgement which he sufferrd in the fight of GOD: that we shoulde knowe that not onely the body of Christ was given to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater and more excellent price payde in this, that in his soule he sufferrd the terrible tormentes of a damned and forsaken man.

X. According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe hauing loosed the forrows of death, of which it was impossible that he shold be holden, or overcomne. He doth not name it simply death: but he expressfeth that the Sonne of GOD was wrapped in the forrows of death, which proceed from the curse and wrath of GOD, which is the original of death. For howe small a matter had it bin, carelesly & as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true profe of his infinite mercie, not to think that death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hecrubes, where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his own Feare: Some translate it Reurence or pietie, but how vnitely, both the matter it selfe, & the verie maner of speaking profeeth. Christ therefore praying with teares & mightie crie, is heard of his own feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed up of death as a sinner: because in that place hee had but our person vpon him. And truely there can be imagined no more dreadful bottomless depth than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken & estranged from GOD, & not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euene as it GOD himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Even thither wee see that Christ was thrown downe, so farre that by enforcement of distresse hee was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why haft thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that hee should rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselfe, y is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is euident, that this sayinge proceeded out of the verie anguish of the botteme of his heart. Yct doe we not meane thereby, that GOD was at any time his enemie or angrie with him. For howe could he be angrie with his beloved sonne, ypo whom his minde refted? Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his fathers wrath toward other, haung him hatefully bent against himselfe?
But this is our meaning: he sufferrd the grievousnes of Gods rigor, for that he being striken & tormented with the hand of GOD, did feele all the tokens
of God when he is angerie & punisheth. Whereupon Hylarie argueth that by this going downe we have obtained this, that death is flame And in other places he agreeth with our judgement, as where he sayth: The crosse, death, and hells are our life. Againe, in another place: Tho sonne of God is in the hells, but man is caried vp to heaven. But why do I alledge the testi monie of a private man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruite of his victorie, they were deliuered which were by fear of death all their life long subject to bondage? It behoved therefore, that he should overcome that fear, that naturally doeth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men; which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his fear was no common fear or conceiued vp to a slender cause, shal by & by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the ducie, with the horror of death with the paines of the hells, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed over them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some lead men, although vnlearned, yet rather mowed by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I do a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against the onuenience of reason, that he should be fearefull for the sal uation of his foule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauallation with saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desparation, which is contrary to faith. First they do but maliciously moue controversie of Christs fear & trembling, which the Euangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approched, he was troubled in spirit & passionate with heauines, & at his vere meeting with it, hee began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfet, that is too foule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truely teacheth, boldely confesse the sorrowfulnesse of Christ, vnlesse we be ashamed of his crosse. And truly, if his foule had not bin partaker of paine, he had bin onely a redeemer for bodies. But it behoved that hee should wrathle, to raise vp them that laye thrown down. And his heavenly glorie is so nothing appaire thyse, that euene herein gloriously thineth his goodnesse which is never sufficiency praised, that he refused not to make our weakenesse upon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorowes, which the Apostle feteth before vs: that this Mediator did feel our inuirmities, that hee might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in miserie. They say: that that thing which is euil of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which joyneth these two things together, that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakenes of Christ should make vs afayde, wherunto he was not by violence or necessitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercy was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoever he of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backbiteres deceived, that they doe not perceiue in Christ an inuirmity clean and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience, for whereas there can bee founde no moderation in our corrupt nature, where where all our affections do with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they do wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his vnconturped state, then there was a moderatió hauing force in all his affections, to restraine excesse. Whereby it might well be that hee was like unto vs in forrow, dead, & fearfulness, & yet that by this marke hee differed from vs. Being so confuted, they leap to another cauallation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse & wrath of God frô which he knew himselfe to be safe. But let the godly readers se how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender & more fearfull then the most part of the verie rascall sort of men. The eues and other euil doers do obstinately haft to death, many do with haute courage despiete: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it for the sonne of God to be astonished and in a manner striken dead with fear of it? For euen that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehementie of grieve, verie drops of blood did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shepe to the eies of other, but when in a secrete corner whither he was gone out of company, he groned vnro his father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needesfull that hee should haue Angels to come downe from heauen to releue him with an vnwonted maner of comforting. How shameful a tendernees, as saide, should this haue bin, to be so farre tormented for fear of common death, as to melt in bloudie sweare, & not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of Angels? What dost not that prayer thrice repeated, (Father if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitteneresse of heart, theweth that Christ had a more cruell and harder batell then with common death? Whereby appeareth that those trifters against whom I now dispute, do boldly babble vppon things that they knowe not, because they never earnestly considered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we be redeemed from the judgement of God. But this is our wifdome, well to understand howe deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man should ask me, if Christ went then down to hell, when he prayed to escape that death? I answere, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how greeuous & terrible tormentes he suffered, when hee knewe himselfe to stande to be arraigned for our cause before the judgement seat of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the spirite did hide it selfe, to give place to the weakness of the flesh: yet must we know, by the tentation by feeling of sorrowe & fear was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the sermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the forrowes of death, because when he felt himselfe as it were forfaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue fro the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that his notable calling vp God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forfake me? For though he was aboue measure grieved, yet he ceaseth not to call him his God, of whom he cried out that he was forfaken. Moreover hereby is confused if atel the error of Apollinaris, as theiris that were called Monothelites. Apollinaris fained that Christ had an eternall spirite in stead of a soule, so that he was only but halfe a man. As though he could cleanse cleanse our sinnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is y affection or will of obedience but in the soule? Which soule of his we knowe was troubled for this purpose, to drive away feare, & bring peace & quietnes to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrarie affection. For here in is a plaine shewe of contrarietie. Father deliuer me from this house. But even herefoere I came even into this house. Father glorifie thy nam. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in vs, euene then when wee most of all endeuour to subdue our selues.

13 Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which al that wee haue hitherto were but vnperfect. For sith there appeareth in the crosse, death, and buriall of Christ nothing but weakenesse: faith must passe beyonde all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although we haue in his death a full accomplishment of saluation, because by it both wee are reconciled to God, and his iust judgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penaltie fully payde: yet wee are saide to be regenerate into a liuing hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the verie resurrection: but howe this is, is better expresse in the wordes of Paul. For hee saith, that Christ dyed for our sinnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue saide, that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousness was renewed and restor'd. For howe could hee by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselfe had lycen still overcome by death: How could he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himselfe had beene vanquished in sight? wherefore we doe so part the matter of our saluation betwene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death wee say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousness was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meanes of his resurrection, his death doeth shew forth her force and effect vnro vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his verie resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vterted his heavenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and a stedfast staye of our faith. As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirite. And in the same meaning in an other, where he entreath of perfection, hee saith: That I may knowe him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellow ship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death should waver, but that the power of God which keepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shewe it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the worde Resurrection, as pit as it is vfed feuerally.
rally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising again he obtained the crowne of conquest, so that there should be both resurrection & life: therefore Paul doth for good cause affirm that faith is destroyed, and the Gospel is become vain & deceitful, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in another place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrors of damnation, to amplifie the same, he saith further: Yea, the same He which died, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediator for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that upon the partaking of his croffe hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be understood, that by his resurrection we obtaine another commoditie which unswerdeth that mortification. For (as the Apostle) we are therefore grafted into like necesse of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, wee may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to prove that we ought to mortifie our members upon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to feckke for those things that are above, and not those that are upon the earth. By which words we are not onely exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newnesse of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate in righteounes. We obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that wee are, as by an earnest deliuered vs, asured of our owne resurrection, of which we know that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he disputeth more at large in the fifteene chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is saide, that hee rose againe from the dead: in which sayings is expressed the truth both of his death & of his resurrection: as if it had beene saide, that he died both dye the same death that other men naturally do dye, and received immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

To his resurrection is not vnfitly adiouned his ascending into heaven. For although Christ began more fully to set foorth his glory & power by rising againe, for that he had nowe layd away that base & vnnoble effate of mortal life, and the shame of the croffe: yet by his ascending vp into heaven only, he truely began his kingdom. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fullfill all things. Wherein seeming of repugnancie he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement; because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had beene penned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conversant in earth. And therefor Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, if any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by faith, that the holy Ghost was not yet given to the faithful, because Jesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lorde himselfe also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not goe away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But hee gueh them a comfort for his corporall absence, that hee wil not leave them as parentlesse, but wil come againe to them after a certaine manner, in deede invisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then then taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enjoyeth, and the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithful, not only to make them live blessedly, but also to die happily. And truely we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then advanced his kingdome, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in overthowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he toke away the pretence of his body out of our right: not to cease to be present with the faithfull that yet wandered in the earth, but with more present power to govern both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the ende of the world, he performed by this his ascension, by which as his body was lifft vp aboue all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and spred abroad beyonde all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christ (faith he) was to goe by death to the right hande of the father, from whence he is to come to judge the quecke and the dead: and that likewise in bodily presence according to the sound doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely & plainly: According to an unspeakable & invisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you al the dayes, eue to the end of the world. But according to the flesh, which the worde tooke upon him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken down from the croffe, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was laide in the grave, that hee was openly shewd in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alway haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuersant according to the presence of his body foutry dayes with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen & is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hand of his father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of mai-efie. Therefore according to the presence of his maieftie, wee alway haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truely said to his disciplies: but me ye shall not alway haue. For the Church had him a fewe daies according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

15 Wherefore, it by & by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hand of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule & gouerne in their fleede. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father will be exalted & reigne by his hand: was receiued to sitt at his right hand: as if it had bin said, that he was inuicted in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred upon the possession of the government committed vnto him, and that he not only entred upon it, but also continueth in it till he come downe to judgement. For so doeth the Apostle expounde it, when he saith thus:
The father hath set him at his right hande, above all principalitie & power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not only in this worlde, but in the worlde to come, &c. He hath put all things vnder his

He doth in deed here shew to them that be his, plain proofes of his power present among them: but because vnder the basenes of flesh his kingdom doth in a manner lie hidde in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke upon that visible presence, which he will openly shewe at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come down from heaven, even such as he was seene to goe vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnpeakable maiestie of his kingdom, with bright glistering of immortalitie, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our redeemer at that day, when he shall seuer of all either the quick or the dead, that shall escape his judgement. For from the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trumpeter, where with all shall be called to his judgement seat, both they that shall be found alive at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the company of the quick. Some there be that in this place expounde the words of the quick and the dead otherwise: and wee see that some of the old writers did stick in doubt upon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaid meaning is plaine & easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creede which is evident that it was written according to the capacity of the common people. And heere with nothing disagreeeth that which the Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortal life at the last judgement shall not dye after a natural manner and order: yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shall be like a death, is not vniustly called death. It is indeede certaine, that not all shall sleepe, but all shall be changed. What meaneth ye? In one moment their mortal life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vterlie transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can deny to be a death: and yet in the mean time it remaineth true, that the quick and the dead shall be summoned to the judgement: because ye dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they ye shall remain and be changed, shall with them be saine taken vp into the aire to meete the Lorde. And truly it is likely that this article was brought out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, & out of the solemn protestation of Paul to Timothy.

18 Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is judge, which hath already appointed vs partners with him in judging: so far is it of, that he will go vp into the judgement scate to condemne vs. For howe shoulde the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? howe shoulde the head scatter abroad his owne members: howe shoulde the patroner condemne his owne clients? For if the Apostle dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come forth that can condemne vs: it is much more true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessor, will not condemne them whom he hath received into his charge and tuition. It is truely no small assurance, that we shall be brought before no other judgement scate, but of our owne redeemer, from whome our saluation is to bee looked for: moreover, that he which now by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessedness, shall then by fitting in judgement perfourme his promise. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the sonne, in giuing him all judgement, that so he hath provided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the judgement. Hitherto I have followed ye order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in fewe words contains the chiefest articles of our redemption, it may serve vs for a Table, wherein we doe distinctly and seuerally see those things that are in Christ worthy to be taken heed of vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the author of it. It is truely by great consent of the old writers ascrib'd to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common trauell written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they judged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine,

delivered by the hands of the Apostles, was worthy to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whencesoever it proceeded at the first, it hath even from the first beginning of the Church, and from the verie time of the Apostles, beene vied as a publike confession, and receiv'd by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not privately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is evident that even from the farthest age it hath always continued of sacred authoritie and credite among all the godly. But that which is onely to be cared for, we haue wholly out of controversie, that the whole Historie of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing contained in it that is not seales with sounde testimonies of Scripture. Which being understood, it is to no purpose either curiously to doubt, or to strue with any man who were the authour of it: vnlesse perchance it be not enough for some man to bee assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but if thee doe also understand any other by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hande it was written.

19 But forasmuch as wee doe see, that the whole summe of our salvation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, wee must beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any partes thereof be it neuer so little. If wee seeke for salvation, wee are taught by the verie name of Jesus, that it is in him; if wee seeke for any other gifts of the spirite, they are to bee found in his annoyning; if wee seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if wee seeke for cleaneffe, it is in his conception; if wee seeke for tender kindnesse, it is theweth it selfe in his birth, whereby hee was made in all things like vnto vs, that he might learne to sorrow with vs; if wee seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if wee seeke for abolution, it is in his condemnation: if wee seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse, if wee seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if wee seeke for cleansing, it is in his bloud: if wee seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hells: if wee seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his burial: if wee seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if wee seeke for immortallitie, it is in the same: if wee seeke for the inheritance of the kingdome of heaven, it is in his entrance into heaven: if wee seeke for defense, for assurednesse, for plentie and store of all good things, it is in his kingdome: if wee seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the judgement, it is in the power giue to him to judge. Finally, if vs the treasures of all sortes of good things are in him, let vs drawe thence and from no where else, euen till wee be full withinall. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diverse hopes, although they haue principal regard to him, yet even in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust cannot creep in, where the abundance of his good gifts hath once beene well known.

The xvii. Chapter.

That it is truly and properly said, that Christ hath deserved God's favour and salvation for vs.

This
This question is also to be afoiled for an addition. For there are some little men after a wrong manner, which although they confefle that we obtaine salvation by Chrifte, yet can not abide to heare the name of deferring, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and fo they will have Chrifte to be only the instrument, or minifter, not the authour, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deed I confefle, that if a man will set Chrifte simple and by himfelfe againft the judgement of God, then there fhall be no room for deferring: because there can not be founde in man any worthineffe that may deferue the favour of God. But, as Auguftine moft trueely writeth, the moft cleare light of predestination and grace is our Saviour himfelfe, the man Chrifte Iefus, which hath obtained fo to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deferveringes of workes or of fith going before. I baffe fhall you let me bee anfwere, whereby that fame man deferved to be taken vp by the Worde that is coetermall with the father into one person, and fo to be the onely begotten fonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the vvere fountain of grace, from whom according to the meafure of euerie one, it floweth abroade into all his members. By that grace every one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that fame man from his beginning was made Chrifte. A-gaine in another place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediatour him felfe. For he that made of the feede of David a man righteous yet neuer should be vnrighteous, without any deferving of his will going before, even the fame hee doth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that head: and fo foorth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Chriftes deferving, we doe not fay that in him is the beginning of deferving, but we clime vp to the ordinance of GOD, which is the firft caufe thereof: becaufe God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediatour, to purchase faulation for vs. And fo is the deferving of Chrifte vnfitly fet against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that thinges orderly one vnder another do not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans iuftification is free by the mere mercy of God, and that there all the deferving of Chrifte come betweene which is contained vnnder the mercie of God. But againft our worke are aptlie fet, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Chrifte, either of them in their degree. For Chrifte could not deferue any thing but by the good pleafure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpofe, with his sacrifice to appeafe the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a fumme: becaufe the deferving of Chrifte hangeth vpon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meanes of faulation, therefore as well the fame deferving, as that grace, is fitly fet againft all the worke of men.

This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God followed the world, y he gaue his only begotten fonne, y whofoeuer beleueth in him, shall not perish. Wee fee how the love of God holdeth the firft place, as the soueraigne caufe or originall, & then followeth faith in Chrifte, as the second or neerer caufe. If any man take exception & fay, that Chrifte is but the formal caufe, he doth more diminish his power than the worde

The grace of God hath appointed the worthines of his fonne for a meanes to make us fome, who in our felues are by nature enemises.

If we obtain righteousness by faith that resteth upon him, then is the matter of our salvation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly prooved. Not that we first loved him, but he first loved us, and sent his Son to be the appearing for our sins. In these words is clearly shewed, that God to the end that nothing should withstand his love toward vs, appointed vs a means to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasing, is of great weight: because God after a certaine unpeakeable manner, even the same time that he loved us, was also angry with us, until he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose serveth all those sayings: He is the satisfaction for our sins. Again: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the Cross. By him, &c. Again: God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himselfe not imputing to men their sins. Again, hee accepted vs in his beloved Sonne. Again, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the Cross. The reason of this mystery is to be fetched out of the first chapter to the Ephesians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, addeth therewith, that we have obtained favour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his favour them whom he loved before the making of the world, but because he vterred his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Christ? For if God is the fountain of all righteousness, it must needs be, that man so long as he is a sinner, haue God his enemy and his judge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousness, such as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtained free righteousness by that sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also meant so oft as the grace of Christ is joined to the loue of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giveth vs of his owne, which he hath purchased: For otherwise it would not agree with him, that this praise is given him seuerally from his father, that it is his grace and procedeth from him.

But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchased vs favour with his father. For this I take for a thing confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our sinnes, if he hath suffered the punishment due unto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, finally, if he being righteous, hath suffered for the unrighteous, then is saluation purchased for us by his righteousness: which is as much in effect as to deserve it. But, as Paul witnesseth, we are reconciled and have received reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hateful by reason of sinne, is by the death of his Sonne appeased, so that he might be favourable unto vs. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be noted as by the transgression of one man, many were made sinners; so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adam we were estranged from God and ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are received into favour as righteous. And
And the future time of the verbe doth not exclude present righteousness, as appeareth by the proceffe of the text: For hee had said before, that the free gift was of manie sinnes vnto justification.

4 But when we say, that grace is purchased vs by the deferving of Christ, we meane this, that we are cleansed by his bloud, & that his death was a satisfaction for our sinnes. His bloud cleanseth vs from sinne. This bloud is it that is shed for remission of sinne. If this be the effect of his bloudshed, that sinnes be not imputed vs: it followeth, that with that price the judgement of God is satisfied. To which purpose serueth that saying of John the Baptist: Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the sinne of the world.

For he setteth in comparison Christ against all the sacrifices of the lawe, to teach that in him only was fulfilled that which Moses shewed. And we know what Moses shewed: Iniquitie shall be cleansed, sinne shall be put away & forgiuen. Finally we are verie well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Christ, And this point the Apostle setteth out in the epistle to the Hebrewes, verie fitly taking this principle, that remission is not wrought without the shedding of bloud. Whereupon he gathereth, that Christ for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Again: that he was offered vp to take away the sinnes of many. And he had said before, that not by the bloud of goates or of calves, but by his owne bloud he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reasoneth: If the bloud of a calfe do sanctifie according to the cleannes of the flesh, that much more consciences are cleansed by the bloud of Christ from dead works: it easly appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, vnlesse we grant vs his sacrifice the power of cleansing, appeasing and satisfying. As a little after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new testament, that they which are called, may receive the promise of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of sinnes going before, which remained under the law. But specially it is convenient to wete the relation which Paul describeth, that Esa. 53. 5 he became curse for vs. &c. For it were superfluous, yea & an abfurditie, that Christ should be charged with curse, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, should purchase righteousnes for them. Also the testimonie of Esa is plain: that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon Christ, and that we obtained health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our sinnes, it could not have beene said, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the paine whereunto we were subiect. Wherewith agree that which followeth in the same place: For the sinne of my people I have striken him. Let vs also recite the exposition of Peter, which shall leave nothing doubtfull: that he did beare our sinne vpon the tree. For he faith, that y burthen of damnation from which we were delivered, was laid vpon Christ.

5 And the Apostles do plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ransom to redeem vs from the guiltines of death. Being justified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whome God hath set to be the propitiatorie by faith which is in his bloud. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, because hee hath given the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his bloud, that hav-

Therefore the paine had beene cast vpon him which we had deserued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the bloud of Christ is the forgiveness of sinnes: as if he shoule haue saide, that we are justified or acquitted before God, because that bloud annswereth for satisfaction

vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hande writing which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the croffe. For therein is meant the payment or recompence that acquitted vs from guiltinesse. Ther is also great weight in these words of Paul: If we bee justified by the workes of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For heereby we gather, that we must fetch from Christe that which the lawe woulde giue, if any man can fulfill it; or (which is all one) that weobtaine by the grace of Christe, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he saide: He that doth these things, shall liue in them. Which he no leffe plainly confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleevng in Christe we are justified from all those things, from which we could not be justified in the lawe of Mofes. For if the keeping of the lawe be righteousness, who can deny that Christe deserued sauour for vs, when taking that burden vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if we ourselves had kept the lawe? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward wrieth to the Galathians: God sent his son subiect to the law, y he might redeem those that were vnder the lawe. For to what ende seuued that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteousness, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousness without works, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousnesse is reckned to vs which was found in Christe onely. And truly for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we finde in him the substance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousness. As Paul faith, that he gave himself a sacrifice of sweet sauour. And in another place: He died for our sinnes, he rofe againe for our justification. Hereupon is gathered, that not onely salvation is giuen vs by Christe, but also that for his sake his father is nowe favourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt but it is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esey sayinge: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for David my seruants sake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witnessse, where he faith: Your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet John after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronounce He. In which sense also the Lorde pronounceth: As I loue because of my father, so shal ye also loue because of mee. Wherewith agreeeth that which Paul faith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to be...
God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 172

Leeue in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demand, whether Christ desired for himself, (as Lombard, & the other scholemen do) is no lesse foolish curiositie, than it is a rash determination when they affirm it. For what needed the sonne of God to come downe to purchase any newe thing for himselfe? And the Lorde declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not saide, that the father provided for the commodity of his sonne in his desueringes, but that he delivered him to death, and spared him not, because he loved the world. And the Prophets manners of speaking are to be noted as, A childe is born to vs. Againe: Reioice thou daughter of Sion: beholde thy king commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of loue should be very cold, which Paul settreth out, that Christ suffered death for his enemies. For thereupon we gather, if he had no respect of himselfe and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying, I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruites of his holines vnto other, doth thereby testify that he purchaseth nothing for himselfe. And truely this is most worthily to bee noted, that Christ, to giue him selfe wholie to saue vs, did after a certain manner forget himself. But to this purpose they doe wrongfullie draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the father hath exalted him, & giue him a name, &c. For by what desuerings could man obtaine to be judge of the world, & the head of the Angells, & to enjoy the soueraigne dominion of God, & that in him should rest that same maiestie, the thousandth part whereof all the powers of men & Angells cannot reach vnto? But the solution thereof is easie & plaine, that Paul doth not there entreat of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect ensuine thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behooueth that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glorie of his Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION WHICH
intreateth of the manner how to receive the grace of Christ, and what profits do growe vnto vs, & what effects ensue thereof.

The first Chapter.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, doe profit vs by secrete wworking of the holy Ghost.

Now it is to be seene how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his onely begotten sonne, not for his own private vse, but to enrich them that were without them & needed them.
Cap. 1. Of the knowledge of them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the salvation of mankind, is vnprofitable and nothing availeth for vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behoveth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, that we are graffed into him, and did put on him. For (as I have before said) all that ever he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we growe together into one with him. But although it be true that we obteine this by faith: yet forasmuch as wee see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartenn of Christ, which is offered by the Gospel, therefore vertie reason teacheth vs to frame vp higher, & to enquire of the secrete effectuall working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enjoy Christ, and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternal godhead & essence of the Spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and blood that the Spirit should testify of him, lest the salvation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are alledged three witnesses in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twice repeated, which we see to be engraven in our hearts in stead of a scale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing & sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithful are chosen in sanctification of the Spirit vnto obedience and sprinkeling of the blood of Christ. By which words hee testifieth vs, that to the entent the shedding of that holy blood should not become voide, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy Spirit. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and justification, faith that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy Spirit is the bonde wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For prove thereof also doe ferue all that we haue taught in the last booke before this, concerning his anointing.

The Spirit being Christes after a peculiar manner both to haue & to be to vs, why pro\npertie his in ful\n\nneffe, & in mea\nsure ours by guise.

2. But that this, being a matter specially worthie to bee knowne, may bee made more certainly eviident, wee must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar manner, to the end that he might seuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternal inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirit of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that general power which appeareth as well in mankinde as in all other living creatures, but also is in vs the rootes and seede of heavenly life. Therefore the Prophets do principally commend the kingdom of Christ by this title of prerogature, that then should flourish more plentifull abundance of the Spirit. And notable above all the rest is that place of Joel: In that day I will powre of my Spirit vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seeme to restraine the gifts of the Spirit to the office of a prophesying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightening of his Spirit will make those those his scholars which before were unskillful and voyde of all heavenlie doctrine. Now forasmuch as God the Father doeth for his sonnes sake give vs his holy Spirit, and yet hath left with him the whole fulness thereof, to the end that hee should be a minister and distributer of his liberality, he is sometime called the spirit of the father, and sometime the spirit of the Sonne. Ye are not (faith Paul) in the flesh, but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any have not the Spirit of Christ, hee is not his. And hereupon he putteth vs in hope of full renewing, for that hee which raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortall bodies because of his Spirit dwelinge in vs. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father be ascrib'd the praise of his owne gifts, whereas hee is the author; and yet that the same be ascrib'd to Christ, with whom the gifts of the spirit are left, that he may give them to those that bee his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinkne. And Paul teacheth that the Spirit is distributed to every one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be known, that he is called the Spirit of Christ, not only in respect that the eternal Word of God is with the same Spirit join'd with the Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if hee had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam given from heauen, to be a quickeening Spirit: whereby Paul compareth the singular life that the sonne of God breaste th in them, that he is the same, that through him all those, with the natural life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise, where hee witnesseth to the faithfull the fauour of Christ and the love of God, hee join'd withall the common partaking of the Spirit, without which no man can taste neither of the fatherly favoure of God, nor of the bountifullness of the holy Spirit, that is given vs.

3 And here it shall bee profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth out the holy Spirit, where it entreateth of beginning & whole restauration of our salvation. First, he is called the Spirit of adoption, because he is a witness vs of the free goodwill of God, wherwith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloved onellie begotten Sonne, that he might be a Father vs, and doth encourage vs to praise boldlie yea and doth ministe to words to cry without feare, ABB. Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest pledge, and seal of our inheritance, because he so giueth life from heaven to vs wandring in the world, and being like to dead men, that wee may be assured that our soule is in safeguard vnder the faithfull keeping of God, for which cause hee is also called life, by reason of righteousness. And forasmuch as hee by his secret watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring forth the buds of righteousness, heis oftentimes called water as in Ezech. A lye that thirst come to the waters, Again: I will pour out my Spirit upon the thirstie; & floods upon the drye land, wherewith agreeeth that laying of Christ, which I did eu. now alledge. If any thirst let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezekiel where the Lord promiseth clean waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as hee restoreth and nourisheth into lively quickness, them upon whom he hath powerd the liquor of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oil and anointment. Againe because in continually seething out & burning vp the vices of our lust, heisseth our hearts on fire with the loue of God and zeal of godlienesse, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, hee is descried vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence doe flowe vnto vs all heavenly riches, or the hande of God, wherewith hee vieth his power: because by the breath of his power hee breatheth divine life into vs, that wee are not now stirred by our selves, but ruled by his stirring & moving: so that if there be a nie good thinges in vs, they bee the fruitez of his grace: but our own gifts without him, be darknesse of mind, and peruersitie of heart. This point is set our plainly enough, that till our mindes bee bent vpon the holic Ghost, Christ lieth in a manner idle, because we coldly espie him without vs, yea & farre away from vs. But wee knowe that hee profiteth none other but them whose head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, and them which haue put on Him. This conioyning only maketh that, as concerning vs, hee is come not vnaprofitably with the name of Sauior. And for prooffe hereof, it is a truth that holy marriage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, & bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spiritie onely he maketh him selfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same Spiritie we are made his members, so that hee conteine vnto vs under him, and wee againe possesse him.

4 But forasmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the most part referred all those thinges, that wee commonly finde spoken to express his force & working: because he bringeth vs into the light of the Gospel by nothing but by faith: as John Baptist teacheth, that this prerogative is giue to them that beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh and blood, but of God: where setting God against flesh and blood, he affirmenth it to be a supernaturall gift that they receive Christ by faith, who other wise should remaine subject to their owne infidelitie. Like whereunto is that answeare of Christ: flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heaven. These thinges I doe now but shortlie touch, because I haue alreadie intreated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holic spirite of promise. For Paul sheweth that hee is an inward teacher, by whose working the promise of salvation pearceth into our mindes, which otherwise shoulebe but beate the aire or our ears. Likewise, when he saith, that the Thessalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the spirite and beleuynge of the truth: by which joyning of them together, hee briefly admonished that faith is selfe proceedeth from nothing els but from the holic spirite: which thing John setteth out more plainly, saying: We knowe that there abideth in vs of the spirite which hee hath giuen vs. Againe, by this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath giuen vs of his spirite. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the Spirite of truth whiche the worlde cannot receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heauenlie wisdome. And hee assigneth to the same spirite this proper office, to put them in minde of those things things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine shoulde light shewe it selsie to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirite of understanding should open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightrlie call the holie spirite, the keye by which the treasures of the heauenlie kingdom are openly vs: and may call his enlightening, the eyesight of our minde to see. Therefore doth S. Paul so much commend the ministrery of the spirite: because teachers shoulde cry without professing, vnlesse Christ his selfe the inwarde matter shoulde drawe them with his spirite that are given him by his Father. Therefore as we haue saide, that perfect salvation is founde in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holie spirite and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospel, and so newe begetting vs, that we may be newe creatures: and purging vs from vnholie filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holie temples to God.

The 11. Chapter.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

But all these things shalbe easie to understand: when ther is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the readers may knowe the force & nature thereof. But first it is convenient to call to minde againe these things that have beene already spoken: that first God doth appoint vs by his law what wee ought to do: if we fall in any point thereof, the same terrible judgement of eternall death that hee pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Again, that forasmuche as it is not onelie hard but altogether aboue our strength and beyond all our power to fulfill the law, if we onely behold our selves, and weigh what estate is worthie for our sufferings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast awaye from God under eternall destruction. Thirdlie, this hath beene declared, that there is but one meane of deliverance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: whereunto appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hand it pleased the heavenly father, having mercie vpon vs of his infinite goodness and clemencie, to succour vs, so that we with sounde faith embrace this mercie, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is convenient for vs to weigh this, what manner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenlie kingdom, forasmuch as it is certaine that not every opinion nor yet every perfitone is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and studie must we looke about for, and search out the naturall property of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the errore of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, ceeiueth no higher thing, but a certaine commo attent to the history of the gospel. Yea, when they dispute of faith in the scholes, in barely calling God the object of faith, they do nothing but (as we haue said in another place) by vaine speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true mark. For whereas God dwelleth in a light, none can atteine to, it behoueth of neces-
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of

Christ become meane betweene vs and it, For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, The way, the truth, and the Life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountain of life) but by him because he only knoweth the Father, & by him the faithfull to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason Paul affirmeth, that hee accounteth nothing excellent to be known, but Christ: and in the xx. chapter of the Acts he faith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Christ (speaking after this manner) I will send thee among the Gentiles, that they may receive forgiveness of sinnes, and portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in mee. And Paul testifieth, that the glory of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glory shineth in his face. It is true indeed that faith hath respect only to the one God, but this also is to bee added, that it acknowledge him whom he hath sent, even Jesus Christ. Because God himselfe should have lyen secrete & hidden farre from us, vntil the brightness of Christ did cast his beams vpon vs. For this entent the father left all that he had with his only begotten sonne, even by the communicating of good things with him to express the true image of his glorie. For as it is said, that we must be drawn by the spirit, that we may be starded to seeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the invisible Father is nowhere else to bee sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustin speaketh excellently well, which intreating of the marke that faith should shooe at, faith that we must knowe whether we must goe and which way: and then by & by after he gathereth that the safest waie against all errours is hee that is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, and man by whom we goe: and both these are founde no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul whome he speaketh of faith in God, meane to overthrowe that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay vpon Christ. And Peter doth most fitly ioyne them both together, saying that by him we beleue in God.

2. Therefore this euill, euon as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which have hidden Christ as it were with a veyle drawn before him, to the beholding of whom vnsesse we bee directly bent, we haue alwaie wandered in manye vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they doe deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance doe with great hurt deceive the silie people, yea (to say truely and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuise doth not only burie but vitally destroy the true faith. Is this to beleue, to understand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not only of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obteine salutation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoever the Church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to bee a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made, by Christ, and that Christ is giuen vs vnto righteousnesse, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I saye, not by... submitting of our sense, wee attaine an entrance into the kingdome of heaven. For when the Apostle faith, that with the heart we believe to righteounesse, and with the mouth confession is made to saluation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressly believe that which he understandeth not, nor feeketh to learne: but be it reuired an expressed acknowledgling of Gods goodneefe, in which consisteth our righteounesse.

3 In deede I deny not (such is the ignorance wherewith we are compassed) that there nowe bee and hereafter shall be many thinges wrapper and hidden from vs, till having put of the burden of our flesh we come neerer to the presence of God:in which very thinges that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our judgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to keepe vnintid with the Churche. But vnder this colour to intitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God & of Christ, not in reuere of the Church. And wee see what a maze they haue framed with this their hidde implicaticio, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choice, so that it be thrust vnder title of the Church, is greedily received of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monstrous errours. Which vnadvised lightnesse of beleefe, whereas it is a most certaine downfall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueth nothing determinately, but with this condition adjoined, If the faith of the Church be fuch. So do they faie, that truth is holde in error, light in blindnes, true knowledge in ignorance. But because wee wil not take the long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the verie plainenesse of the truthe it selue will of it selfe minister a confusion ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnantes of ignorance, but they definitively faie that they beleueth a right, which stand amased in their ignorance, yea & doe flatter themselues therein, so that they do agree to the authority and judgment of the Church, concerning things vnknown. As though the Scripture did not euer where teach, that with faith is ioyned knowledge.

4 But we do grant, so long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expressed, not onely because many thinges are yet hidden from vs, but because being compassed with many mistes of errors, wee attaine not all thinges. For the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and proceede on further forwarde with gentle willingnesse to learne. Therefore Paul exhorted the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for reveluation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vnclad of our flesh, we attaine to knowe leffe then were to bee wifhed, and daily in reading wee light vpon many darke places which doe convince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle God holde thy vs in modestie, assigning to euery one a measure of faith, that euery the very best teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpressed faith, we may mark in the Disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to bee fully enlightened. We see, howe they hardly tasted the very first introductions, howe they did stick euery in the smallest points, howe they hanging at the mouth of their maister did not yet much procede, yea when at the womens  information they ranne to the grave, the resurrection of their maister was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witness of their faith, we may not say that they were utterly without faith: but rather if they had not beene persuaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him woulde haue perished in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalm with spices the corpes of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleued his wordes whome they knewe to be a speaker of truth, yet the grossenesse that stil possessed their mindes so wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a maner amased at it. Whereupon it is faide, that they then at the last beleued when they had by trial of the thing it selfe proved the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then beganne to beleue, but because the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiuing liuelinessse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vn-expressed faith, because they recently embraced Christ for their only teacher, & then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And wee need not to seeke any more familiar proofs hereof than this, that in all things alway vn-belleue is mingled with faith.

5 We may also call it an vnexpressed faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelists do rehearse that many beleued, which only being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but Christ was the Messias which had bin promisde, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subjection willingly to submitte themselves to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deed but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christs promisde, concerning the healing of his son when he came home, as the Euangelist reheareth, beleued againe: because he received as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, & th'o submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receive his doctrine. Albeit it is to bee known, that he was so tractable and ready to learn, that yet in the first place the word of the beleuing signifier a particular beleefe: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professt to be the schollers of Christ. A like example doth John set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleued the womens report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, saide thus: Now we beleueth not because of thy report, but we have heard him, and we know that he is the Saviour of the worlde. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithful, in deed not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchesafeth to granto great honour to that godly affection. But this willingnesse to learne, with a desire to proceed further, differeth farre from that grosseignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the vn-expressed faith, such as the Papistes have imagined. For if Paul severely censur eth them which alway learning, yet never come to the knowledge of truth, howe much more grievous reproche doe they deserve that of purpose purpose studie to know nothing?

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receive him such as he is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospel. For as he is appointed to be the marke of our faith, so we cannot goe the right way to him, but by the Gospel going before to guide vs. And truely there are opened to vs many treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ shoulde little profit vs. So Paul joyneth faith an inseparable companion to doctrine, where he faith: Yee haue not so learned Christ, for yee haue beene taught what is the truth in Christ. Yet doe I not restraine faith to the Gospel, but that I confesse that there hath beene so much taught by Moses and the Prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath beene delivered in the Gospel a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is warthie called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also hee faith in an other place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the newe and vnaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our schoolmaister, hath more plainly set forth the mercie of his father, and more certainly testified of our salvation. Albeit it shalbe the more case and more convenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generalitie to the specialtie. First we must bee put in minde that there is a general relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the worde, than the sunne beames from the sunne from whom they procede: Therefore in Esaiie God crieth out: Hear me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, John sheweth in these worde: these things are written that yee maye beleue. And the Prophet meaning to exhort the people to beleue, Psal.95.8. faith: This day if yee shall heare his voyce. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beleeue. Moreover, God doeth not without cause in Esaiie let this marke of difference betweene the children of the Church and strangers, that hee will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefite vnuersefall to all, why shoulde hee directe his wordes to a few? Wherewith agreeeth this that the Evangelists do commonly vs the worde Faithfull, and Disciples, as several words expressing one thing, and specially Luke verie oft in the Acts of the Apostles. Yea and hee directeth that name even to a woman in the ninteenth Chapter of the Acts. Wherefore if faith do swarue neuer so little from this marke, to which it ought to to be directly luced, it keepeth not her own nature, but becommeth an uncertain lightnesse of beleefe and wandring errour of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and suffeined, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. We do not here dispute whether the minisitrie of man bee necessary to sowe the worde of God that faith may be conceiued thereby, which question we will else where intreate of: but we saie that the worde is selfe, howsoever it be conteuied to vs, is like a mirrour when faith maie beholde God, Whether God doeth therein vs the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne owenlie power. Yet he doeth alwaies shewe him selfe by his worde to those, whom his will is to drawe vs to him, Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is giuen to the Gospel Rom.1.5. And
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of faith.

And in another place he praiseth the obedience of faith in the Philippian. For this is not the only purpose in the understanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we understand what will he bear us. For it not so much be houseth vs to knowe what he is in himselfe, but what one he will be to vs. Nowe therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceived by the word. And the foundation hereof is a foreconceited persuasione of the truth of God. Of the asfaredness whereof so long as you minde shall dispute with it selfe, the worde shall be but of doubtfull and weake crede, yea rather no crede at all. But alfo it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnlesse thou further holde this for vn doubtedly determined, that whatsoeuer proceedeth from him, is the tacred and inviolable truth.

7. But because not at every word of God mans hearte is raised vp to faith, we must yet further search what this faith in the word hath properly respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death.

It was the saying of God to Cain: The blood of thy brother crieth to mee out of the earth. Yet these are such sayinges as of them selves can doe nothing but shake faith, so much lest are they able to stablish faith. We deny not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how oft soever, whatsoever and in what sort soever it speake: but now our question is, alone, what faith findeth in the worde of the Lorde to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation & vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for fear? And how should it but flee God, of whom it is a fayrider? But faith ought to seke God, and not to flee from him. It is plain therefore, that we have not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accounted for faith to knowe the wil of God, of what sort soever it bee: But what if in the place of will, whereof manie times the message is forowful and the declaration dreadful, wee put knowledge or mercie? Truely so wee shall come neerer to the nature of faith. For wee are then allured to seke God, after that wee have learned that satisfaction is laide vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that he hath care and love of vs. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may testifie that he is our mercifull father, for that otherwise we cannot approch vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Psalms these two things Mercie & Truth do cleane together, because neither shoulde it any thing profit vs to knowe that God is true, vnlesse he did mercifull allure vs vnto him: Neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy satisfaction, I have not hidden thy goodnesse and thy trueth. Thy goodnes & thy trueth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heauen, thy truth even to the cloudes. againe: All the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his covenante. againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the trueth of the Lorde abideth for euer. againe: I will sing to thy name vpon thy mercie and truth. I omitt that which is in the Prophetes to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For wee shall shall rashly determine that God is mercifull unto vs, vnlesse himselfe doe testify of himselfe, and prevent vs with his calling, least his will should bee doubtfull and vnknowne. But we haue alreadie scene, that Christ is the only pledge of his love, without whome on euerie side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath: Nowe forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much preuaile, vnlesse hee make vs to rest in it, therefore such an understanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not foundlie agree in itselfe, but as it were, dispureth with itselfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is far from attaining and climbing vp to perceiue the verie will of God: and also the hart of man, as it waue eth with perpetuall doubting, is far from resting assured in that persuafion. Therefore it behoueth both that our wit be lightened, and our heart strengthened by some other meane, that the worde of God may be of full eredite with vs. Nowe we shall have a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a stedfast and assurred knowledge of Gods kindnes toward vs, which being grounded vppon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both receiued to our mindes, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceed anie further, it shall be necessarie that I make some preambles to dissuade certaine doubts that otherwise might make some stoppe to the readers. And first I must confute that distinction flyeth about in the schooles, betwene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are convicted with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlineffe, doe beleue all that is necessarie to salvation. As though the holy Ghost in lightning our harts vnto faith, were not a witnes to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they give the name of faith to such perswasion void of the feare of God. We neede to strue no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, sicke as it is declared by the worde of God. Whereby shall plainely appeare howe vnskillfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue alreadie touched parte, the rest I will adde hereafter as place shall serve. At this present I saye that there cannot bee imagined a greater absurditie, than this invention of theirs. They will have faith to bee an affent, whereby euerie deseruer of God may receive which is vterred out of the Scripture. But first they should haue scene whether euery man of his owne power do bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witnesse of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly plaise the fools, in demanding whether faith which a qualitie added doth forme, be the same faith or an other and a newe faith. Whereby appeareth certainlie, that in so bablying they never thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleuing doeth alreadie conteine in it the reconcillaition, whereby man approcheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul: With the heart is beleued to righteousnesse, they would cease to faine that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should bee sufficient to ende this contention: that the verie same affent (as I haue alreadie touched, and willagine more largely repeate) is rather of the heart than of the braine, rather of affection than of understanding.
Cap. 2 Of the manner how to receive

For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, which is such as the Lord preferreth no kind of obedience above it: and that worthily, forasmuch as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as John the Baptist witnesseth, the beleeuers doe as it were subscribe and seal unto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull wee doe in one worde determinately faie, that they speake fondly when they saye that faith is formed by adding of godlie affection vnto affent: whereas affent it selfe, at least such affent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godlie affection. But yet there is an other plainer argument that offereth it selfe to bee alleadged: For whereas faith embraceth Christ as hee is offered vs of the father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesses, for higheenesse of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountain of living water: without doubt no man can euer truly know him, vnlesse he doe therewithall receive the sanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man desire to have it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot be known but with sanctification of his Spirit: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meanes be seuered from godly affection.

9 Whereas they are wont to laie this against vs, that Paul saith: If a man haue all faith, so that hee remoue mountaines, if he have not charitie, hee is nothing: whereby they woulde deform faith, in spoiling it of charitie: they confider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the diuers gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which he had reckoned the diuers kindes of languages, power and prophecie, and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the best of these gifts, that is to say, such gifts whereby more profitable and commodious might come to the whole bodie of the Church: hee straightway faide further, that hee would shew them yet a more excellent wai. That all such gifts, howe excellent soever they bee of themselues, yet are nothing to bee esteemed, vnlesse they serve charitie. For they were given to the edifying of the Church, and vnlesse they be applied thereunto, they loose their grace. For proffes of this he particularly rehearseth them repeating the selfe same gifts that hee had spoken of before, but in other names. And hee seeth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which euery vngodlie man may both haue and abuse, as the gift of tongues, as prophecie and other gifts of grace; it is no maruell if it be seuered from charitie. But all the errour of these men standeth in this, that where this worde Faith, hath diuerse significations, they not considering the diuerstie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of Iame: which they allege for maintenaunce of the same errour, shall bee else where discussed. But although for teachings false, when wee mean to shew what manner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are diuerse sortes of faith: yet wee acknowledge and speake of but one faith of the godlie, as the Scripture teacheth. Manie indeede doe beleeue that there is a God, they thinke that the Historie of the Gospel and other other parts of the Scripture are true as (commonly wee are wont to judge of such things, as either are reported being done long ago, or such as we ourselves have been present at &c.) There be also some that go further, for both they believe the word of God to be a most assured oracle, & they do not altogether despise his commandments, and they somewhat after a sort are moved with his threatenings and promises. It is indeed testified that such hath faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they do not with open ungodliness fight against the word of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine snee of obedience.

10. But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthy of the name of faith. From the sounde trueith whereof how farre it differeth, although it shall bee hereafter more largelie entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not nowe be touched by the way. It is said, that Simon Magus beleued, which yet within a little after bewrayed his owne vnbeliue. And whereas it is said that hee beleued, we do not understand it as some doe, that hee fauned a beliue when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being overcome with the majesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to bee one of his. After the same manner it is faide in the Gospell of Luke, Luke 8.7.9. that they beleue for a time, in whom the seede of the word is choked vp before it bring forth fruites, or before it take anie roote at all, it by & by withereath away and percheth: we doubt not that such delited with a certain taste of the word doe greedily receiue it, and begin to feele the divine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfeiting of faith, they beguile not onelie other mens eyes, but also their owne minudes, For they perceiue themselves, that that reuerence which they shewe to the wordes of God, is most true godliness, because they thinke that there is no ungodliness but manifest and confessed reproch or cotorp of his word. But what manner of affear foever that be, it pareaeth not to the very heart to remaine there established: & though sometime it seemeth to have taken rootes, yet those are not liuely rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guileful hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueth himself. But let the that glory in such shadowes of faith unnderstand, that therein they are no better than the Diuils, But that first sort of men are farre worse than the Diuils, which doe senselesly heare & understand those things for knowledge whereof the Diuils do tremble. And the other are in this point equal with the diuils, that the feeling such as it is wherein they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and discouragement.

11. I know that some thinke it harde, that we assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to bee the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is easilie dissolved: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor doe truely feele the effectuall working of the Gospell, but they that are foreordained to saluation: yet experience theweth that the reprobate are sometime moved with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne judgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no absurdity, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the taste of the heauenlie gifts, that

2. Theff.1.4.
Cap. 2  Of the maner how to receive

Heb. 6.

Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they foundlie perceive the spirituall force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lorde, the more to condemne them and make them inexecutable, conuyceth himselfe into their minds so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirit of adoption. If anie obiect, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certeinly their adoption: I answere that though there be a great likenesse & affinitie betweene the elect of God and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onelie that affiance which Paul peaketh of, that they cry with ful mouth, Abba, Father. Therfore as God doth regenerate only the elect with incorruptible seede for euer, so that the seede of life planted in their hearts neuer perisheth: so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it mai be stable and sure. But this with standeth not but that that other inferior working of the Spirite may haue his course, even in the reproube. In the meane season the faithful are taught, carefully & humbly to examine themselves, leaft in seed of assurednes of faith, do creep in carelessse confidence of the flesh. Befide that, the reproube do neuer conceive but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow of the sounde bodie, because the holy Spirite doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect only, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their use. But yet it is trueuely said, that the reproube beleue God to be mercifully vnto the, because they receive the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainlye enough: not that they are partakers of the selle same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, under a cloke of Hypocrisie. And I denie not, that God dooth so farre give light vnto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the sounde effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shew himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that hee having truly delivered them from death, doth receiue them to his safeguard, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercie. But hee vouchsafteth to grant to the only elect the lively roote of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that objection answered, if God doe truly shewe his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually established, for that there is no cause to the contrary, but that God may enligten some with a present feeling of his grace, which afterwards vanishe away.

Wicked men who by reason of a vanishing foreseens which they feele in the grace of God to wards them for a time, are said to beleue, yet indeed doe neither embrace what they should nor as they should.

12. Also though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindnesse toward vs, and an assured persuasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no maruell that the feeling of Gods loue in temporall things doeth vanish away: which although it haue an affinitie with faith, yet doth it muche differ from faith. I graunte, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alwaies stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I denie that the reproube doe procede so farre as to atayne vnto that secrete revelation, which the Scripture sayeth to belong to the elect onelie. Therefore I denye that they doe eyther conceiu the will of GOD as it is vnchangeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanishe away.
Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take liuelie rootes, in processe of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeeres it bringeth forth not onelie blossomes and leaues but also fruite. Finally, as by the fal of the first man, the Image of God might have been blotted out of his minde, and foone, so it is no maruell, if God doe shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterwarde hee suffereth to bee quenched. And there is no caufe to the contrarie, but that hee may lightely ouerwash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meanes time to bee holden for trueth, that howe small and weake fouer faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the spi-rite of God, and a scale of their adoption, the printe thereon can never bee blotted out of their heartes: as for the reprobate, that they are ouersped with such a light as afterwarde commeth to nought, and yet the Spirite is not deceitfull,because hee giueth not life to the seede that he ca-specth in their heartes, to make it abide alwaies incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is evident by the teaching of the Scripture and by dailie experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needs be that there is raised in their heartes a certaine desire of mutuall love. So for a time there liued in Saul a godlie affection to loue God, by whom he knewe himselfe to bee fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetnesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswacion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so doe they not foundly loue him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired servantes. For to Christ onelie was the spirite of loue giuen, to this end, that he should pour it into his members. And truely that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onelie: The loue of God is powewed abroad into our heartes by the holi Spirite that is giuen vs, even the same loue that ingendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrary side wee see God to bee maruellously angrie with his children, whom yet hee caeseth not to loue: not that in himselfe hee hatheth them, but because his will is to make them afraide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of fleche, to shake off their drou-linesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore at one time they conceiue him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not fainedly doe praise to appease his wrath, to whom yet they fle with quiet assured trust. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some do counterfaite a shewe of faith, which yet doe lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodayne violent motion of Zeale, they deceive themselves with false opinion.
And it is no doubt that flegishnesse so possesseth them, that they doe not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is likely that they were suche to whom (as John witnesseth) Christ did not committe himselfe when yet they beleued in him: because hee knewe them all, and knew what was in man. If manic did not fall from the common faith (I call it common,because the faith that lefteth but a time hath a great like-nesse and affinitie with the liuelie & continuing faith) Christ wold not haue faide

John 8:31. saide to his Disciples: If ye abide in my wordes, then are ye truely my Disciples, and ye shall knowe the truth, and the truth shall make you free. For hee speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increas of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishe quench the light that is given them. Therefore doeth Paul affirm, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanith away, because they have not taken liuetic roote. Like as Christ also faith in Matthew: every tree that my father hath not planted, shall bee rooted vp. In other there is a groffier kind of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. James inueth against that kinde of men, that with deceitfull pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paul require of the children of God a faith unfaigned, but in respect that manie doe presumptiously challenge vnto them selues, that whiche they have not, and with vain coloured deceit doe beguile other or sometime themselves, Therefore hee compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein faith is kept, because manie in falling from good conscience, have suffered shipwracke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the word faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sounde doctrine of religion, as in the place that we nowe allcadge, and in the same Epistle where Paul doth have Deacons to holde fast the mysterie of faith in a pure conscience. Againe, where he publisheth the falling awaye of certaine from the faith. But on the other side hee saith that Timothy was nourished vp with the wordes of faith. Againe, where hee saith that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that manie parte from the faith: whom in another place he calleth reprobrate touching faith. As againe he chargeh Titus, saying, Warne them that they bee founde in the faith. By foundnesse he meaneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easlie corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Even because in Christ, whom faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisdome and knowledge: therefore faith is woorthly extended to signifie the whole summe of heavenlie doctrine, from which it can not be seuered. Contrariwise sometime it is restrained to signifie some particular object, as when Matthew faith, that Christ saue the faith of them that did let downe the manseke of the palse through the tiles: and Christ himselfe crieth out that hee founde not in Israel so great faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earnestly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onelie asent and answere of Christ, hee required not Chrisites bodilie presence, therefore in respect of this circumstance his faith was so much commended. And a little here before wee haue shewed, that Paul ta- keth faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue that neither are regenerate by the spirite of God, nor do heartily worship him. Also in an other place hee setteth faith for the doctrine whereby wee are instructed in faith. For where hee wrieth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministerie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these formes of speach Randeth a proportionall portional relation. But when the name of faith is unproperly removed, to signify a false profession, or a lying title of faith, that should seem to be as barren a figurative abuse, as when the scar of God is set for a corrupt & wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes faide in the holy History, that the foraine nations which had been transplantted into S.

14. Now let us againe goe through all the partes of it, eu'n from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I think) there shal remaine nothing doutfull. When in defining faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men vs to have of those things that are subject to mans understanding. For it is so farre above it, that mans wit must goe beyond & surmount it, yea, & when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attain that which it feeleth, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiueth not, it understandeth more by the very assurednesse of persuasion, than if it did with mans owne capacity throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul faith verie well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, breeth, depth, & height, & to know the loue of Christ that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiueth by faith, is euerie way infinte, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre higher than all understanding. But yet because the Lord hath disclosed to this Saintes the secrete of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledging: and John calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he testifieth, that the faithful do certainly know that they are the children of God. And undoubtedly they knowe it assuredly: but rather by being confirmed by persuasion of Gods trueth, than by being informed by natural demonstration. And this also the words of Paul doe declare saying, that while wee dwell in the body, we are wandering abroad from the Lord, because we walke by faith, and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we understand by faith, are yet absent from vs, and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of faith standeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

15. We further call it a sure and settled knowledge, to expresse thereby a more found constancie of persuasion. For as faith is not contented with a doubtful and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke & entangled understanding, but requireth a full & fixed assurednesse, such as men are wont to have of thinges found by experience and proved. For vs believe sticke th to fast, and is so deepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is faithfull, no man is without great contention perswaded in his heart.
Of the manner how to receive cially when hee commeth to the profe, then the wauring of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation maintaineth the authoritie of the word of God, but endeavoreth to giue remedy for the aforesaid disease, that God may obtaine to be fully beleued of vs in his promises: The words of the Lord (faith David) are pure wordes, as the Siluer tried in a fornice of earth, fined leven times. Againe, The word of the Lorde fineth is a shield to all that trust in him. And Salomon confrming the same, & in a maner in the same words, faith: Every word of God is pure. But fir the whole 119. Pflame entreateth only in a maner vpon the same: it were superfluous to alledge any more places. Truly so oft as God doth so commend his word vnto vs, he doeth therein by the waie reproche vs with our vnbelieuings: because that commendation tendeth to no other ende, but to root vp al peruerse doubtinges out of our heartes. There be also manie which so conceive the mercies of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be even ther-with all pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enclose within too narrow bounds the very fame mercifulnesse, of which they thinke themselves most assuredly persuaded. For thus they think with themselves, that his merci in deed great & plentiful poured out vpon manie, offering it selte & ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it wil extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an halfe: Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with assured quietnes, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doubtfulness.

But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to faith, even such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of dout. And that cannot be, but that wee must needes truely feele & prove in our selues the sweetness thereof.
And therefore the Apostle out of faith deriveth assured confidence, and out of it againe boldnesse. For thus he faitheth, that by Christ wee haue boldnes, and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which wordes truely hee saith, that it is no right faith, but when wee are bolde with quiet minds to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnes procedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good wil & our salvation.
Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is vsed for Confidence.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefstay of our faith, that wee doe not thinke the promises of mercie which the Lord offereth to bee true onely in other beside vs, & not at all in our selues, but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our owne. From hence procedeth that confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, vnlesse som had rather say, that peace is derived of it. It is an assurednesse that maketh the conscience quiet & cheereful before God, without which the conscience must of necel-sitie bee vexed, & in a maner torn in pieces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it do forget God &it selte, and so flumber a little while. And I may truely say, For a little while, for it doth not long enjoy that miserable forgetfulness, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods judgment sharply tormented. Briefly, there is none truely faithfull, but hee that.

that being persuaded with a sound assuredness that God is his merciful & loving father, doth promise him selfe all things upon the truthe of God's goodness: and none but he that trusting upon the promises of God's good will toward him, conceiueth any undoubted looking for of salvation; as the Apostle saith in these words: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord; but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heir of the kingdom of heaven, There is none, (I say) faithfull, but hee that leaning upon the assuredness of his owne salvation, doth confidently triumph vpon the Deuils & death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am persuaded (faith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate vs from the love of God, wherewith hee embraceth vs in Christ Jesus. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meanes well lightned, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And eche where his common manner of teaching is such, that hee declareth that no otherwise do we not well comprehend the goodness of God, vnlesse we gather of it the fruites of great assuredness.

17 But (some man will say,) the faithful do find by experience a far other thing within them selves; which in recording the grace of God toward the, are not only tempted with vnquietnesse, which oftentimes chanceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrours: so great is the vehemency of temptations to throwe downe their minde: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assuredness of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we have our aforesaid doctrine to stand. But truely, when we teach that faith ought to bee certaine and assured, we doe not imagine such a certainie as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is assailed with no carefulnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulness: So sate be we from settling their consciences in such a peaceable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sorte soever they bee afflicted, they doe never fall & depart fro that assured confidence which they have conceived of the mercy of God. The scripture saith forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable, than in David, specially if a man beholde the whole continual course of his life: But yet howe hee was not alway of quiet minde him selfe declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reproocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angrie with his owne vnbelievingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (faith hee) and why art thou disquieted within me? truthe in God. And truely the same discouragement was a plain token of destruction, even as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in another place we reade a larger confession there of, where he saith: I said in my overthrowe, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in another place he disputeth with himselfe in careful & miserable perplexity yea & quarrelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath God.
Cap. 2. Of the maner how to receiue

Psal. 77. 10. God forgotten to haue mercy? will he cast off for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue sayde, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the highest. For, as in despaire he condempneth himselfe to destruction, and not onely confesseth himselfe to be tossd with douring, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaueth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forfaken him, & hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper, Wherfore not without caufe he exhorteth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had found by experience, that he was tossd among troublesome waues. And yet (which is maruellous) in all these assaults, faith vpholdeth the heartes of the godly, and is truely like vnto a Dace trea to endeauer and rise vpward against al burdens, how great focuser they be: as David when he might seeme to be vterly overwhelmed, yet in rebuging himselfe, ceaseth not to rise vp to God. And truely he that striving with his owne weaknesse, reforruit to faith in his troubles, is alreadie in a maner conqueror. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lorde, be strong, he shall strengthen thy heart: wait for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearfulnesse, & in repeating the same twice, confesseth himselfe to be sometymes suicid and to many troublesome motions. And in the mean time doe not only become displeased with himselfe in these faultes, but earnestly endeauoroueth to amendment. Truly if wee will more necerly by good examination compare him with Ahab, there shall be found great difference. Esay was sent to bring remedy to the careful greese of the wicked king & hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these words: Be in safegard and be quiet:feare not, &c. But what did Ahab? As it was before saide, that his heart was moved as the trees of the wood are shaken with wind, though he hard the promise, yet he ceased not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of sibelecf, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God, yet doth not open to himselfe the gate by faith. Couterariwise the faithfull whom the weighty burden of temptations maketh to stoupe, & in a maner oppresseth, do constantly rise vp, although not without trouble and hardnesse. And because they knowe their owne weaknesse, they pray with the Prophet: Take not the wordes of truth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that sometime they become dumme as though their faith were vterly overthrown, yet they faint not, nor turn their backs, but proceed in their battell, & with praire do encourage their faithfullnesse, leaft by favouring themselves they should growe to vnsemeble dulness.

Psal. 116. 7. Faith wrestling with disinclination doth alwayes conquer.

Psal. 27. 14. For the understanding thereof, it is needful to returne to that divisi don of the fleshe and the spirite, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearly appear. The godly heart therefore feelcth a diuision in it self, which is partly delited with sweetnes by acknowledging the goodnes of God, and partly grieved with bitternesse by feeling of his owne miliery, partly refteth upon the promisse of the Gospell, and partly trembleth by reacon of the testimony of his own wickednesse: partly rejoyneth with conceiving of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation cometh by imperfection of faith, forasmuch as we never be

be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulness to be altogether filled and possessed with faith.

Hereupon proceed those ballots, when the distrustfulness that abideth in the remnant of the flesh, rieth vp to assail the faith that is inwardly conceived. But if in a faithfull minde assuredness be mixed with distrustfulness, come we not then alway to this point, that faith standeth not in a certaine & cleare knowledge, but in a darke & doubtfullie entangled knowledge of God's will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diversely drawn with undrie thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by seuered fro faith, though we be vexed with toiling vp & down of distrustfulness, yet are we not there fore drowned in the bottomles depth thereof: and though we bee shaken, yet be we not thrust down out of our place. For this is always the end of this battell, that faith doth at length with wrestling overcome those hard troubles wherewith when the is so besieged the feemeth to be in danger.

19. Let this bee the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it never so small, is poured into our hearts, wee by and by begin to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and loving toward vs: yet the same we see from a farre off, & farre distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceived. For thenes forwa, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profite) as it were by proceeding further, we come vnto so much the neerer, & therefore certainer beholding of him, & by very continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the mind enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first held wrapper in much ignorance, which by little & little is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkly seeing that which the seeth, but that the enjoyeth a cleare knowledge of God's will toward her, which is the first and principal point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, have beames of the sunne shining in sidelong at a narrowe windowe, or as it were but halfe glimmering, he wanteth in deede the free beholding of the sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an undoubted brightness thereof, and receiuent the beste of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoeuer we bee on each side shadowed with much darkenes, yet we are sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect assuredness, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it bee but a little, to shew forth his mercy.

20. Both these points the Apostle verie well teacheth in diverse places. For when he saith, that we know vnperfectly, and prophecy vnperfectly, & see by a dark speaking as by a glasse, he Heweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wisedome is giuen vs in this present life. For though those words do not expressly sheweth that our faith is vnperfect so long as we are gone ynder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection, we have need to be continually exercisd in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, can not be comprehended by our small capacity, and narrow compass. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto every one of vs, his owne dulnesse is an hindrance and lay that he can not come so nere as were to be wise, But how sure and undeceivable a taste of itselfe, eu'n a small drop of faith doth

Of the manner how to receive, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Gospel we behold the glory of God with uncouered face, having no veil betwixt us and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doting and fearfull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selve, is inclined to vnbelievingnes. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and divers in kinde, doe oftentimes with great so- daine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience opprest with heauie burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament & grone with it selue, and sometime accuseth it selues; sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openlie troubled. Whether therefore adversitie doth shew an apperance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it selfe any proofe or matter of his wrath, from thence vnbeliefe doth take weapons & engines to vanquish faith withall: which are allway directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, shoulde both not hope for any helpe at his hande, and also be affraide of him as of our deadly enemy.

21 To beare these assaults, faith doth arme and fortifie her selue with the worde of God. And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enemi, because he is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that even when he punisht he is also mercifull, because his chastisement commeth rather of love than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that God is a reservoir of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardoe readie for all offences, so as the sinner resorseth to the mercifullenesse of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoever it be in mervailous wife tossed & vexed, yet at length raiseth vp above all daungers, & never suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatsoever conten- tions do trouble & weary it, in the end they come to the assurednes of this confidence. And hereof this is a proofe: that the holy ones, when they think them selves most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet even then do make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, even then neverthelesse they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their mone to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would never finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleueth that there were some help at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blangeth their smalnesse of faith, complained in deed that they perished, but yet they called to him for help. And when he rebuketh them for their small faith, yet hee doth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vn- beleuers, but stirreth them to shake off thy fault. Therefore we affirm againe which we have aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is never plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoever it bee shaken & seeme to bende this way or that way, the light thereof is so never quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidde vnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the worde which is an incorrup- tible seede, bringeth forth fruite like to it selue, the spring whereof doeth neuer neuer wither & vterlie perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of despair to the holy ones, to feele according to the consideration of present things, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Job affirmeth that his hope shall proceede so farre, that though God doe kill him, yet hee will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truest therefore. Vnbeliefe reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardlie assaileth them: neither doth the deadlie wound them with her weapons, but only troubleth them, or so hurtest them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth; suffereth vs. for a shield that being holden vp against weapons, doth so receive the force of them, that it either vterlie driueth them back, or at least doth breaketh their violence, that they cannot perceiue them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remove his foot, and giue ground a little: & when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not striken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rise thus hys as to fay with David, if I walke in the middest of the shadowe of death, I wil feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is in deed to terrible to walke in the darkenesse of death, & it cannot be but that the faithfull, how much strength soever they haue, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, they haue God present with them, and prouiding for their safetie, that fear is overcome with assurednesse. For (as Augustine faith) howe greate engines focuer the deuil raieth vp against vs, so long as the poiffegeth not the place of the heart, where faith dwellith, he is cast out of the dores. And so if we may judge by the successe, the faithfull not only escape safe from every batterie, so that by and by receiving freshe courage they are ready to come again into the field; but also that this is fulfilled which Iohn faith in his canonical Epistle: This is the victorie that overcometh the world, even your faith. For he affirmeth that it shall not only win the victory in one or few battelles, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the ouer hande of the whole world, although it be a thousand times assaileth.

22 There is another kind of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assurednesse of faith is so nothing at all diminuished, that thereby it is the more soundly established. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learn by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselves with the same offences: or recording with themselves their own miserie, doe learn to hang altogether upon the Lord without whom they see themselves to be more fickle and sooner vanishing than any blast of winde. For when the Apostle, in setting forth the scourges wherewith the Lorde in old time had punished the people of Israel, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they intagl not themselves with like evils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dulnes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppresse than firghtned. And when hee taketh occasion of the Iews fall to exhort him that standeth, to take heed; y he fall not, he doth not thereby bid vs to water, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnes, but only he taketh away.
arrogant presumption & rash trusting too much in our own strength, that after the trusting out of the lewes, the Gentiles being receiv'd into their place, should not too much outragiously triumph against them. Albeit he speakseth there not onely to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried only in outward show. For neither doth he admonish every man particularly, but making a comparison betwene the lewes and the Gentiles, after that he had shew'd that the lewes in this that they were reject'd, did suffer just judgement for their vnbeliefe and unthankfulness, he also exhorted the Gentiles that they should not, by being proud & extolling them selves, lose the grace of adoption lately confered on them. But as in that general rejecting of the lewes, there remained yet some that were not fallen from the covenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should bee puffed vp only with foolish confidence of the flesh, & to abuse God's loving kindness to their own destruction. But although you take this as spoke to the elect and faithfull, yet therupon shall follow no inconvenience. For it is one thing to hold down the rash presumption which out of the remainders of the flesh creepeth sometime even into the holy ones, that with vain confidence it waxe not outrageously wanton: and another thing to strike the conscience with fear, that it rest not with full assuredness in the mercy of God.

23 Then, when he teacheth, that with fear & trembling we should work our own salvation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustom vs with much abasing of our selues, reuerently to looke vp into the mightines of God. For truly nothing doth so much awake vs to cast all our confidence & assuredness of mind vpon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selues and carelesnes conceived by knowledge in conscience of our own wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to bee taken: In the multitude of thy goodness I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in fear. Where he comly cojoineth the boldnes of faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent fear, which we must needs feel so oft as comming into the sight of God's majestie, we perceive by the glorious brightness thereof, howe great is our owne filthines. And Salmone faith truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne heart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into evil. But such fear he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not such whereby we should be troubled and vterly fall: even such a feare as when the mind confounded in it selfe, doth recover it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it receiueth by trust in him. Therfore there is no cause to the contrary, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured comfort, in respect sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanity, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde vpon the truth of God. But how (wil some men say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one mind? Euen thus, as contrarily vnreasonable dulnesse, and carelesnes. For whereas the wicked travaile to procure to themselfe a want of grief, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet the judgemen of God to presseth them, that they can not attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that that in fighting valiantly, they may restrain themselves under the bridle of modesty. And by the process of the text it appereth, that this was the ent-ent of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of fear, and trembling to be the good pleasure of God, whereby he gieeth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this mean-ing ought we to take that saying of the Prophet: The children of Israel shall fear God and his goodnesse: because not only godlines engendreth the reverence of God, but the very sweetness & pleasant taste of grace, fill-eth man being discouraged in him self with feare & admiration, to make him hang upon God, & humbly yeeld himself subject to his power.

24 Yet we do not hereby make roome to that most pestilent philosophy, which many haste papists at this day begin to coin in corners. For, because they can not defende that grosse doubtfullnes which hath bin taugh in scholes, they fyle to another deuise, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfulness. They confesse, that so oft as wee looke vnto Christ, wee finde in him full matter to hope well: but because we are always vnworthy of those good things that are offered vs in Christ, they would have vs to waue & stagger in beholding of our own vnworthines: Breely, they place confidence betweene hope & feare, that it altereth from the one to the other, by enterchangable times & courses: & they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is pressed down, when the one ariseth, the other again falleth. So when Sath. feeth, y those open engines wherewith before time he was wont to destroy the assurednes of faith, do now nothing preuail, he endeuoreth by crooked vnderminings to overthower it. But what manner of confidence shalle that be, which shall now and then yeeld to desperation? If (say they) thou consider Christ, there is assured saluation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assured damnation. Therefore of necessitie distrust & good hope must by enterchang-able courses raigne in thy minde: As though we ought to imagine Christ standing a farre off, & not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for saluation at his hande, not because he appeareth a farre of vs, but because he hath graffed vs into his body, & so maketh vs partakers not only of all his good things, but also of himselfe. Therfore I thus turne this their argument against themselves: If thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good things is by way of communicating so giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, & thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteousnesse drowneth thy sinnes, his saluation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthinesse commeth betwene thee and God, that thy vnworthines come not in the sight of God. Breely, this is true: we ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor vs from him, but with both hands to hold fast that fellowship whereby he hath coupled himself vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The body indeede (faith he) is dead by reason of sinne: but the spir-it of Christ that dwelleth in you is life for righteousnesse. According to these mens trifling deuise he should haue saied, Christ in deed hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remain subject to death and damnation. But he faith farre otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation which which wee desere of our felues, is swallowed vp by the salvation of Christ, & to proue it, he wwesth the same reason that I haue alreadie, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaneth vs from all lesie with vnvisible knot of fellowship, but with a certaine meruelle communication daily more and more, and more and more growtheth, by & in one body, till he bee made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue saide a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weaknesses thereof is among violent sodaine motions bowed either or thither. So in the thick mist of temptation as the light thereof is choked, but whatsoever happeneth, it causeth not from endearour to seake God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposefully intreateth of this question in his first Homelie in the Dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying vp on the soule, me thinke I find in it two things as it were contrarie. If I beholde the soule itself, as it is in itselfe and of itselfe, I can say nothing more truly of it, than that it is utterly brought to naught. What neede I nowe to reckon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, covered with darkness, entangled with recountfull entimentes, itching with lusts, subject to passions, filled with illusions, always inclined to cuill, bent to all kindes of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Nowe if all the righteounesse of it being looked vp by the light of truth be found like a cloth stained with floures, then what shall the vnrighteounesses thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darkness, howe greater shall the very darkness be? What then? without doubt man is made like unto vanity: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But howe then is he utterly nothing whom God doeth magnifie? How then is he nothing, towarde whom God heart is set? Brethren, let vs take heart againe. Though we bee nothing our owne heartes, peraduenture there may some what of vs lie hidden in the heart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, howe doest thou set thy heart toward vs? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But howe be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Even before thee, not within thee; so in the judgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as thought they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of theselues, yet with thee they are, according to that sayenge of Paul, not of the workes of righteousness, but of him that calleth. And then hee faith, that this coupling together of both considerations is marvellous. Truely those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion hee more plainly declareth in these words, Now if with both these considerations we diligently look vp on our selues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peraduenture it is more increased. Truely it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our selues, but in the Lorde. If we thinke thus: if he hath determined to saue vs, we shall by and by be delivered: now in this

we may take courage. But let vs climb vp into a higher watch towre, & seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reverence, wee I say but in the heart of God. We be, but by his allowing as worthy, not by our owne worthinesse.

26 Now, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in every place wisernes is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisedome, and in some places wisedome it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reverence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore hee that will truely worship him, will entenduer to shewe himselfe both an obedient sonne and a servisable fervant vnnto him. The obedience that is giuen to him as to a father, the Lorde by the Prophet calleth honour: the servise that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth fear. The sonne (faith he) honoreth the father, and the fervant the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoever he putteth difference betweene them, thou seeft how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lorde bee vnnto vs a reverence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any manuell if one minde receiue both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnnto vs, hath cause enough, although they were no hels at all, why he should dread his displeasure more greuously than any death. But also (such is the wantonnenesse of our flesh to runne to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restraine the same by all meanes, wee ought therewithall to take hold of this thought, that the Lorde vnnder whose power we liue, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in liuing wickedly doe provoke his wrath against themselves.

27 But that which faith that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie casteth out feare, because feare centeineth punishment, diagreement with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might doe it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to revenge: therefore they shakke for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they think that it hangeth ouer them, for they looke every moment when it shall fall vpnto their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is above saide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang ouer their necks, but they are made the more ware not to procure it. So faith the Apostle when he speakeith to the faithfull: Be ye not deceived: for this commeth the wrath of God upon the children of vnbeleeue. He threatneth not y Gods wrath wil come vpon the, but putteth the in mind to think vpon this, y the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doinges as he had recited, y they thefelues should not be willing also to proue it. Albeit it seldom happeath that the reprobate be awakened with onely and bare threatenings, but rather being already grosse and venemensible dul with their owne harde-nes,so oft as God thundreth from heauie they harden the thefelues to obstinacy, but when they are once striken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a servill feare: and in comparison set it for contrary to free natures & willing feare which becometh children. Some other doe suttely thrust in a middle kind, because that same servill and constrained affection sometime to subdueth mens minde, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Nowe wee understande, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to have respect, the possession of salvation & eternal life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is favourable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of salvation, when he him selfe doth assure vs of his loue. Let him shew his face (faith the Prophet) and we shall be safe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to bee the summe of our salvation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs there remaineth no perill, but that all things shall prosper well with vs.
Therefore faith, having taken holde of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life, and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God.
For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either length or honor or wealth of his life, forasmuch as God willed none of these things to bee appointed vnto vs, but is contented with this assurednesse: God will never fail how so euer many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the cleere assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the word of God. But whatsoever miseries and calamities bestride vnto them whom God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie: but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when we did meane to express the summe of blessednes, wee named the fauour of God, out of which springe doth flowe vnto vs all kindes of good things. And this we may commonly note through out the Scriptures, that wheneuer mention is made not onely of eternal salvation, but also of any good thing in vs, wee bee alwaye called backe to the loue of God.
For which cause David faith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired then life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doth flowe vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and wee bee uncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shall be accuserd, and therefore miserable: But if the fauourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, euene our verie miseries shall be blessed, because they are turned to helps of our saluation. As Paul, when hee heareth vp a rehearsefall of all aduersities, yet he glorieth that he was not by them scuried from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alwayes beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewise David fetteth the onely fauour of God against all the terroours that trouble vs. If (faith he) I shall walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And wee alwaye feele that our minde doth want, vslese being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is saide in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose GOD is the Lorde, and the nation whom he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

29 Woc
29 Wee make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of God, because faith properly faith upon it. For though faith doe beleue God to be true in all things, whether he command or forbid, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently receive the commandements, and beware of things that he prohibiteth, & hath regard to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not found in commandements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercy, and in no other promise, but such as is freely given. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stand in our selves. Therefore if we will not have our faith to tremble and waver, we must lay it with that promise of salvation, which is willingly and liberally offer'd vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our mercie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witness of the Gospel, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commandements and also from the promises of the law, because there is nothing that can establish faith, but that liberall emba Cage, by which God reconcileth the world to himself. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospel together, when he teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospel was committed to him vs to the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to salvation to every one that believeth that in it is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith. And no marvel, for if the Gospel is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is no other testimony sure enough of Gods good will toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest upon free promise, wee doe not deny but that the faithful doe every way embrace and receive the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercy to be the proper marke of faith. Even as the faithfull ought in deed to acknowledge God to be the judge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly have regard unto his merciful kindness: forasmuch as he is described to them to be considered such a one as is loving and mercifully, free from wrath, of much goodnes, gentle vs, all, pouring forth his mercy vpon all his workes.

30 Neither yet doe I regard the barkings of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they find fault with this restraint, as though in dividig faith it did take holde but of one piece thereof. I grant (as I have already said) that the generall object of faith (as they terme it) is the truth of God, whether hee threaten or put vs in hope of favour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the world when it was not yet scene. If the fear of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatenings to bee excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeed true. But the cauillers doe vniustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the worde of God. For our meaning is onely to shewe those two things, first, that faith neuer stedfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but becau cause it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those points are worthy to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God & the rebrobes, betwene the faithful & the vnbelieuing. If a man do beleue that God both justly commandeth all that he commandeth, and truly threatneth, shall he be therefore called faithful? Nothing leefe. Therefore there can be no fault stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercy of God. But now to what end do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of salvation? But how doth faith bring salvation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconuenience, if in the definition wee doe enforce the principall effect thereof, and do joine vnto the generall name, in stead of a difference that mark that yeuereth the faithfull fro the vnbelieuing. Finallie, the malicious have nothing to find fault withal in this doctrin, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in the same blame, which calleth the gospel properly the word of faith.

2. Tim. 1:18.

But hereupon againe wee gather that which we have before declared, that faith doth no leesse neede the worde then the fruit doth neede the lucie root of the tree, because no other (as David testifieth) can trueth in the Lorde, but they that knowe his name. But this knowledge is not according to euerie mans imagination, but fo far as God himselfe is witness of his owne goodnes. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in an other place, saying: Thy salvation is according to thy worde. Againe, I haue trusted in thy worde, saue me. Where is to bee noted the relation of faith to the worde, and then how salvation followeth. And yet in the meantime we do not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof vnlesse faith sustein it selfe, it can never giue vnto God his due honor. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that hee beleued that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I haue beleued, and I am sure that he is able to keepe that which I haue left with him vntil that day. But if a man wery with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall well perceiue that they which do highlie esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a little profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to doe whatsoever he will, but when eu'n the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amazeth vs with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the effectuation of God's power, when we prefer aboue it those things, which Satan threatneth against God's promisses. This is the reason why Esai, meaning to print into the harts of the people assurednes of salvation, doth so honorably in-treat of the infinite power of God. It seemeth of that so soon as he hath begunne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliatiou, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandrith about in long and superfluous circumstances, searching how meruellously the Lorde governeth the frame of Heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is heere nothing that stritteth not past for the circumference of the matter that hee speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to doe all things be presentlie set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the worde, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, heere is declared his effectueffectuall power, because godlinesse (as wee haue already shewed in an other place) doth alwaies apply the power of God to vse and woorke, specially it seeth before it selfe those worke of God, whereby hee hath testifid himself to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was once the author of salvation, will be an ever-lasting preserver thereof. And David putteth vs in mind by his owne example, that those benefits which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euery man, doe afterward auaile to the confirmation of his faith Yea when God seeth to haue forsake vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his auncient benefits may recomfort vs, as it is said in another Psalm, I haue beene mindful of olde dayes. I haue studied vpon all thy worke.

&c. Againe, I will remember the worke of the Lorde, and his meruues from the beginning. But because without the word all quickly vaniseth away that wee conceiue of the power of God and of his workes, therefore we doe not without cause affirme that there is no faith, vnlesse God giue light vnto it with testimony of his grace. But here a question might be mooued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it seethem with zeale of faith, passed beyonde the bondes of the worde. Sara, when shee sordently desired the promised issue, gave her bondmaide to her husbande. It cannot be denied but that shee many wayes sinned: but nowe I touch onely this fault, that being caried away with her zeale, shee did not restraine herselfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by cruel crafty meanes: shee deuiced her husband the witnesse & minister of the grace of God: she compelled her sonne to lyesthew by divers guiles and deceits corrupted the truth of God: Finally in making a focere of his promise, she did as much as in her lay, destroied it. And yet this at howe much souer it was cruel, and worthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessarie that she shoulde overcome many offences, that she might so earnestly endeavour to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and dangers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarch Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the yonger sonne, yet ceased not to be more fauourably bent to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truely these examples doe reach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it bee a true faith, hath alwaye the uppore hande. For as the particular errour of Rebecca did not make voide the effect of the blessing, so neyther did it make voyde her Fayth which generally reigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that dooing. Neuerthelesse therein Rebecca vrtued howe ready mans minde is to fall so soone as hee giueth him selfe, neuer so little libertie. But though mans default and weakeenesse doth darken faith, yet it doeth not quench it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, howe carefully wee ought to hang vpon the mouth of GOD, and also confirmeth that which wee haue taught, that Faith vaniseth awaye, vnlesse it bee vpholden by the Woorde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Isaac and Rebecca had.
had become vain in their crooked wanderings out of the way, unless they had beene by Gods secret bridle holden in obedience of the word.

32. Againie, not without cause we include all the promises in Christe, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospel: and in another place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is ready to be shewed. For if God promiseth any thing, he therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimony of his love, neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they have great and continuall benefits of Gods liberalitie heaped upon them, doe thereby wrap them selues in so much the more grecious judgement. For if they doe neither think nor acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they do not with them selues consider his goodnesse, therefore they cannot thereby bee better taught of his mercy than brut beasts, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receive the same fruite of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceive it not. Neither doeth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to them selues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises doe then only appear, when they have found faith with vs, yet the force and naturall propertie of them is neuer extinguisht by our vnbeliefe or vnthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lorde by his promises doth proouke man not onelie to receive, but also to thinke vpon the fruite of his bountifulnesse, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Whereupon we must returne to this point, that every promise is a testifying of Gods loue toward vs. But it is out of question, y no maie there be of God but in Christ, he is the beloved sonne, in whom the loue of the father abideth and resteth, & then from him poureth it selfe abroad vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that wee haue obtained favor in the beloved one. Therefore it must needs be demurred and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in another place calleth him our peace: in another place he setteth him our as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly natural kindnes bound vnto vs. It followeth then y wee must cast our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs.

And that Paul teacheth no absurdity, yet al Gods promises whatsoever they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There be certaine examples y make for the contrarie, For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when hee required of the Prophet the manner how to worship god aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlinesse is praised. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romaine, could scarcely understand that which was known not to all the Jewes, yea and that verie darkly: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the sacrifice of Naama,by the prophets answer were allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whomme Philip was carried, which if he had not had some faith, would not have taken vpon him the straue & expenses of so long a journey, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, howe hee bewraied his ignorace of the Mediator. And truly I grant that their faith was partly unexpressed, not only concerning Christs person, but also concerning his his power & the office committed vnto him of the father. Yet in the meane time it is certain, that they were instructed in such principles, as gave them some taf of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither woulde Eunuch haue come in haft to Jerusalem from a farte contry to worship an unknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Jewiſh religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grous of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had beene to fond an abfurditie for Elyzen when he taught him ofmall things, to haue faid nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a dark knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vfe them selues in the sacrifices of the law, which much haue bene differenced by the very ende of them, that is Christe, from the falle sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare & outward declaration of the worde of God, ought to haue largely sufficied to make it to be beleued, if our owne blindness & stubbornenes did not withſtand it. But our mind hath such an inclination to va· nitie, y it can never cleaue falt vnto the truth of God, & hath fuch a dulnes, y it is alway blind & cannot fee the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing availablely done by the worde without the enlightening of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is farte aboue mans vnderstanding. Neither that it be fufficient that the minde be lightned with the spirite of God, vnlesfe the heart bee alfo strengthened & ftabled with his power. Wherein the schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith do only take hold of a bare & simpel affent by knowledge, leaving out, y confidence & asurrednees of the heart. Therefore faith is both waies a singular gift of God, both y the mind of man is clenfèd to take the truth of God, & that his heart is ftabled therin. For the holy Ghost not only is the beginer of faith, but alfo by degrees encreafeth it, vultily it the bring vs to the heavenly kingdom. That good thing (faith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepere in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But howe Paul faith that the holy Ghost is giuen by the hearing of faith, we may easie dif− folue it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an abfurditie for him to call the holy Ghoste the effect of faith, which is the author & cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherewith God garnishe the Church, & by increafings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no marual, if he ascribe those things to faith which maketh vs fit to receiue them. This is reckned a moft strange conclusion, when it is faide, that no man hath to whom it is giuen, can beleue in Christ. But that is partly becaufe they do not confider either how secret & high the heavenely wisedome is, or how great mans dulnes is in conceiving the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not vnto that asfured & steadfaft constantnees of heart, that is to say, the cheefe part of faith.

34 But if (as Paul preacheth) no man is witneſfe of the will of man, but the spirite of man that is within him, then how shoulde man be sure of the wil of God? And if the truth of God be vnceraine among vs, in those things we prefently behold with our eye, how shoulde it be asfured and steadfafte among vs there where the Lord promifeth fuch things as neither eye feeth.
Cap. 2. Of the maner how to receiue

nor wit comprehendeth? But herein mans sharpenes of understanding is so overthouene and failth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schole, is to forfake his own wit. For by it as by a veil cast before vs, we are hindered that we cannot attain the misteries of God, which are not disclosd but to little ones. For neither doth flesh, & bloud disclose nor natural man perceiue those things that are of the spirit, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be judged. Therefore heere in the help of the holy Ghoste is necessarie, or rather herein his force only reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath bin his counsellor, but the holy spirite searcheth out all things, even the deeps secretees of God, by whom it is brought to passe, that we know the minde of Christ. No man (faith he) can come to me, vnlesse my father that sent mee, draw him. Every one therefore that hath heard and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seene the father, but hee that is sent of God. Even as therefore we cannot come vnnto Christ, but being drawne by the spirite of God: so when we be drawne, wee are lifted vp in wit and mind about our understanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a newe sharpenesse of understanding, wherewith it may beholde heavenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before dazeled in itselfe. And so mans understanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doeth neuer till then truely begin to taste of those things that belong to the kingdom of God, being before altogether vnfaulourie & without judgement of taste to take a savor of them. Therefore when Chriftie did notably set out vnnto two of his discipulus the mysteries of his kingdom, yet he nothing prevailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might understand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the spirite of Trueth must bee sent vnnto them, to pourne into their mindes the same doctrine which they had heard with their eares. The word of God is like vnnto the Sunne that shineth vnnto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profite among blinde men. But wee are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot perceiue into our mind but by the inward matter the holy ghost, making by his enlightning an entree for it.

35 In another place, when we had to entreate of the corruption of nature, we have more largely shewed how vsit men are to beleue. Therefore I will not weary the readers with repeating the same again. Let this be sufficient that the spirite of faith is called of Paul faith itself, which the spirite giueth vs, but not which we have naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denyeth that it is of mans own motion: and not contented therewith he addeth further, \\

iv it is a declaratiō of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he faith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdom of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh in deed of outward miracles: but becaufe reproue are blind at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth also that inwardly scale, whereof he maketh mention in in an other place. And God, the more gloriously to set forth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchsafeth not to grant it to all universally without difference, but by singular priviledge give it to whom he will. For profe of we have allledged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expostor, crieth out that it would please the Saviour to teach him, and that the verie beleuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deserving. No man (faith he) commeth to mee, vnlesse my father draw him, and to whom it is given of my father. It is maruellous that two doe heare, the one despisth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despisth, impute it vnto himselfe: lette him that ascendeth, not arrogantly assigne it to himselfe. In an other place. Why is it giuen to one and not to an other? It grieueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wote not what depth of the judgements of God which we may not search, proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I maie cry out with wondering, but not shew it in disputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when hee enlighteneth vs, vnto faith by the power of his Spirit, doeth there with all graffe vs into his bodie, that wee maie be made partakers of al good things.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath received, may be further conuicied into the heart. For the word of God is not througly received by faith, if it swimme in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken root in the bottom of the heart that it may be an invincible defeece to bee & repellse al the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true understanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more evidently appeareth, even by so much as the ditruellfulness of the heart is greater than the blindness of the wit: & as it is harder to have the minde furnished with assurednes, than the wit to bee instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a scale, to scale vp in our hearts those same promises, the assurance where of it first imprinted in our wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirme and establish them. Sith ye beleued (faith the Apostle) yee are sealed vp with the holie Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the spirithe the hearts of the faithfull are grauen as with a scale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratificeth the Gospel vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he faith: God which annointed vs, which hath also sealed vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our hearts. And in an other place when he speaketh of confidence and boldenesse of hoping well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

defenderth faith, when we holde fast that which is saide in the Psalme. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore we wil not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountains shall leap into the heart of the sea. Also this most sweete quietnesse is spoked of in another place: I laie downe and slept, and rose againe, because the Lorde hath sustaine me. it is not meant therby that David was alway with one vindisturbed course framed to a merrie cheerefulnessse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God, according to his proportion of faith, therefore he glorieth that he without feare despieth al that euere might disquiet the peace of his mind. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Esaie it is laide: In hope end silence shall be your strength, In the Psalme: Holde thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrues: Patience is needful, &c.

38 Hereby we may judge how pestilent is that doctrine of the Schoolemen, that we can no other wisely determine of the grace of God towards us, than by morall conjecture as euery man thinketh himself worthy ofit. Trullie if we shall weigh by our works how God is minded toward us, I grant that we can attaine it with any conjecture, bee it neuer so slender; but faith ought to have relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall wee be armed, if we laie that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, so that the purenesse of our life doe deserve it? But because I have appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrarie to faith, then either conjecture or any thing more vnto doubting. And they do very ill write to this purpose that testimony of the preacher which they have oft in their mouthes: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or loue. For to (speake nothing how this place is in the common translatió corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such wordes: that is, that if any man will judge by the present state of thinges, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboreth in vaine, & troubleth himselfe to no profit for his pains: fith all thinges happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Wherupon followeth, that God doth not alway witnessse his loue to them to whom he maketh all thinges happen prosperously, nor doeth alwayes vnder the hatred to them whom hee punisheth. And that he doth to condemn the vanitie of mans wits, if it be so dull in thinges most needefull to be knowne: as hee had written a little before, that it cannot be discerned what the soule of a man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to die in like manner. If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we hold of the immortality of soules, standeth vp6 conjecture: may hee not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits which gather that there is no certeintie of Gods grace, because wee can conceive none by the carnall beholding of present thinges?

39 But they all edge that it is a point of rash presumption, to take vpon vs an undoubted knowledge of Gods will. I woulde indeede graunt it vnto unto them, if we did take so much upon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subject to the slenderness of our witte. But when we simply fay with Paul, that we have receiv'd not the Spirit of this world, but the Spirit that is of God, by whose teaching wee may know those things that are given vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible robberie of God to accuse the revelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vaflured or vndoubted, what do we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they fay, that this also is not without great presumptuousnesse, that we dare to glory of the Spirit of Christ. Who would think that their dullnesse were so great that would be counted masters of the world, that they so lowly stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credibl, vnlesse their owne writings that are abroad did testify it. Paul pronounceth that they oneie are the children of God, that are mowed with his spirite: and these men would haue them that bee the children of God, to be mowed with their owne spirit, and to be without the Spirite of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy Ghost ministreth that worde vnto vs, which oneie can beare witnesse to our spirite that we are the children of of God. These men, although they forbid vs not to call upon God, yet doe take awaie his spirite, by whose guiding she should haue beene rightly called vpon. Paul denieth that they are the servants of Christ, that are not mowed with the Spirite of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirite of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnlesse wee feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they finge a hope without anie such feeling. But peraduenture they will answere, that they do not deny that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie & humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the faith, to pronounce themselves whether they have Christ, whose vnlesse a man do acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirite that God hath giuen vs (faith John) we know that hee abideth in vs. And what do we else but call the promises of Christ in doubt, when we wil be counted the servants of God without his spirite, which hee hath openly declared, that hee would poure our vpon all his? Beside that, wee doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godlie religion, it is a token of miserable blindness, to haue Christians noted of arroganarie, that dare glorye of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorifying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truely Christ faide, that his Spirit is v混凝土 to the world, & is onely known of them with whom he abideth.

And because they will not goe about to overthrow the stedfastnesse of faith with digging onely of one mine, they affaile it also otherwise. For they fay, that although according to our present state of righteousness, we male gather a judgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perfuance to the end abideth in suspense. A goodlie confidence of salvation forsooth is left vnto vs, if wee judge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment we be in favor, and what shall become of vs to morow we cannot tel. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise; I am surely persuaded (faith hee) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, nor death, nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall sever vs from the love whereby with the Lord embraceth us in Christ. They seek to escape with a trifling solution, praying that the Apostle had that by speciall revelation. But they are held so hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things commonly come by faith to the faithful, not those that he himselfe specially feth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in f ear with mention of our weakenesse & vnstedfastenesse: Let him that standeth (faith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a fear whereby we should be overthrown, but whereby we may learn to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednesse of faith to a moment of time, whose propertie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Sith therefore the faithfull do impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his spirit they do by faith enjoy the beholding of the heavenly life; so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be ashamed to confess it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulness, in vnikindely hiding God's goodnesse, than he doeth declare his modestie or submission.

Because it seemed that the nature of faith could not otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the subf face of the promise vs which it refeth as upon her proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, faith by and by falleth downe or rather vaniseth away; therefore we tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applieth to his discourse, where he faith that faith is a substance of things to bee hoped for, & a certainty of things that are not seene. For by this word Hypothesis substance (for that term he vseth he meaneth as it were, an upholding stay, wherupon on the godly mind leaneth & refeth. As if he should say that faith is a certaine & assured possession of those things are promised vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypothesis for affiance, which I mislike not albe it I follow that which is more commonlie receiued. Againe, to signifie that eu to the last day wh the bookes shalbe opened, they are higher than those things that may bee perceived with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handeled with our handes, and that the same are no otherwise possed by vs, but if we go beyond the capacity of our owne wit, & bend our understanding above all things that are in the world, yea and clime above our felues, he hath therefor added that this assurednes of possession is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plaine appearance (as Paul wrighteth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaintie or proofe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a conjunction of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he faileth as much as he did say, that it is an euident hewing of things not appea ring, a seing of things not seene, a plaine vision of darkie things, a presence of things absent, an open hewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such

Rom. 8:38.

But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in fear with mention of our weakenesse & vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (faith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a fear whereby we should be overthrown, but whereby we may learn to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednesse of faith to a moment of time, whose propertie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? such as they be that pertaine to our salvation,cannot be sene in themselues & in their owne nature as they call it; but we behold them only in his word, of whose trueth we ought to be so fully persuaded,that we ought to hold all that he speakest as it were already done & fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it self to receive such a taste of God's goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholly kindled to loue God againg? For that flowing plente of sweetnes which God hath laide vp in store for them that feare him, can not be trueltie knowne, but that it must therewithall vehemently move affection: & whose affection it once moueth, it very rauisht & carieth him beyonde hirselfe. Therefore it is no marueile, if into a peruerse & crooked heart never enteth this affection, by which being conuerted vp into y verrie heauen, we are suffred to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of god, & the most sacred privy places of his kingdom, which may not bee defiled with the entrance of an uncleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teache, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnesse. For it is faith onelie that first engendreth charitie in vs. Howe muche more rightly doth Bernard teache; I beleue (faith bee) that the testimonie of conscience, which Paul calleth the glorie of the godlie, consisteth in three things. For first of al it is necessarie to beleue y thou canst not haue forgiuenes of sins, but by the pardon of God; then y thou canst haue no good work at all; vnlesse he also giue it: last of al y thou canst by no works deserue eternall life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A little after he addeth y these things suffice not, but y there is a cettaine beginning of faith, because in beleuing that sins cannot be forgiuen by God, we ought alio to beleue that they are not forgiuen vs, til also we be perswaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, that salvation is laid vp in store for vs; because God forgiueth sinnes, he himselfe giueth merits, & he hiselphe also giueth rewards, that wee may not stay still in this beginning. But these & other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

42 Now wheresoeuer this lively faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternall saluation: as an vnindividable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it forth out of it selfe, which hope of faith being taken awaie, how eloquently, gloriously, soeuer we talk of faith, yet we are conuerted to have no faith at all. For if faith (as is above saide) be an as sured persuasion of Gods trueth, that it cannot lie vnto vs nor deceuie vs, nor become voide, then they that have conceiued this assurednesse, trueth doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their persuasion cannot be but true: so that briefeli, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath beleued to be trueth promised of God. So faith beleueth y God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his trueth in conuenient time. Faith beleueth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shewe himselfe suche a one towarde vs. Faith beleueth that eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day receiued. Faith is the foundacion whereupon hope resteth, hope nouriseth & sustayneth faith. For as no man can looke for anie thing at Gods hande, but he that hath first beleued his promises; so againe the weaknesse of our faith must with pacient hope and expectation bee sustayned and cherishe; that...

that it fall not as fainting for wearinesse. For which reason Paul doeth well place our salvation in hope. For hope, while it in silence loketh for the Lord, restrayneth faith that it fall not headlong with tooe must hast: hope stregeth faith, that it waver not in Gods promises, nor beginne to doubt of the truth of them: hope refreseth faith that it waxe not wearie: Hope streggeth faith to the utmost bounde, that it faine not in the mid course, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continually renewing and restoring, it makest it now and then to rise vp frether than it selve to continuance. But how many waies the helps of hope are necessarie to the stregthening of faith, shall better appeare, if we consider with howe manie sorts of temptations they are affliated and shaken, that have embraced the word of God. First, the Lord in dittring his promises doeth oftentimes holde our minde longer in suspence than we would with: here it is the office of hope to performe, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises doe tarie, yet we should waite still for them. Sometime he suffereth vs not onelie to faile, but also seemeth to be highly displeased: here it is much more necessarie to have hope to helpe us, that according to the sayinge of an other Prophet, wee maie still looke for the Lord, that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There rise vp all corneres (as Peter faith) that ask: where is his promise or his comming? for as much as since the fathers slept, all things do continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the flesh & the world do whisper the same thing in our ears. Heere must faith stayed with suffrance of hope be helden fast fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thousand yeres like as one day.

43 For this conyoning and alliance the Scripture sometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preserves through faith, vnto the discloasing of salvation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more sily agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we have alreadie taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment & strength of faith. Sometimes they are joyned together: as in the same Epistle. That your faith & hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians our offaith deriveth expectation, because in patiently hoping, we holde our desires in suspence, till Gods convenient opportunity be opened. Al which matter we may better understand by the tenth chapter to the Hebrues, which I haue alreadie alleaged. Paul in an other place, although he speake unproperly, yet meaneth the same thing in these words: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousnes, even because we embracing the testimonie of the Gospell concerning his free loure, do looke for the time when God shall openly shew that which is now hidden vnder hope. And now it is plain how foolishly Peter Lombard layeth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, and the desiring of works. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: & we haue alreadie declared that faith hath one only mark the mercie of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a lively reason he bringeth. If faith (he) thou darest hope for any thing without desimerings, ye shall not be worthie to be called hope, but pre-sumption. Who (gentle reader) wil not worthily abhorre such beasties, that say, say, it is a rash and presumptuous decree, if a man have confidence that God is true of his word. For where the Lord willeth vs to look for all things at his goodness, they say it is presumption to lean and rest upon it. A master meeteth for such scholars as he found in the mad schools of filthie babblers. But as for vs, when we see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceive a hope of salvation, let vs gladly presume so much upon his truth, as trusting upon his onlie mercie, casting away the confidence of works, to be bold to hope well. Hee will not, deceuie that saide: Be it vnto you according to your faith.

The iiij. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein you are instructed of Repentance.

A lbeit wee have alredie partly taually how faith possesseth Christ; and how by it wee enjoy his benefites: nevertheless this were yet darke, vnlesse we did also make declaration of the efects that we feel therby. Not without caufe it is saide, that the sum of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiueneffe of sinnes. Therefore leaving out these two pointes, whatsoeuer we shall saie of faith, shall bee but a hungry & vn-perfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth give both vnto vs, and wee obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching required, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shalbe to Repentance, because when this article is well perceiued, it shall the better appeare how man is justifie by only faith and mere pardon, and yet how real holines of life (as I may so call it) is not seuered from free imputation of righteousnes. Now it ought to be out of question, that Repentance doth not only immediately follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon & forgiuenece is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being delivred from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdom of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but hee must returne from the errors of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruite out of a tree, they never knew the force thereof, and are moued with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2. Christ (say they) and John in their preachings doe first exhort the people to repentance, & then they afterward saide that the kingdom of heauen is at hande. Such commandement to preach, the Apostles received, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superficiously sticke vpon the joyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the wordes hang together. For why the Lord Christ & John do preach in this manner: Repent yee, for the kingdom of heauen is come neere at hand; doe they not fetch the cause of repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their wordes are as much in effect as if they had saide: because the kingdom of heauen is come neere at hand, therefore repent.
repent yee. For Matthew, when hee hath shewed that John so preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, concerning the voice crying in the wilderness, Prepare the waye of the Lorde, make straights the pathes of our God, But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tydinges. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not doe a certaine meane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out, but we meane to shew that a man cannot earneftly apply himselfe to repentance, vnlesse hee know himselfe to bee of God. But no man is trulie persuaded that he is of God, but he that hath first received his grace. But these things shall be more plainly discoursed in the proceef following. Peraduenture this deceived them, that many are first by terror of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they haue throughly digested, yea before they haue tasted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which some account among vertues, because they see that it is neere to true and just obedience. But our question is not here how diversely Christ draweth vs vs to him, or prepareth vs to the endeavours of godliness; only this I say, that there can be no vprightnesse found where reigneth not the Spirit which Christ received to communicate the same to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalme, With thee is mercifulnesse, that thou maist bee feared, no man shall ever reuerentlie feare God, but hee that trufteth that God is mercifull vnto him: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the law, but he that is persuaded that his services please him; which tenderness in pardoning and bearing with faultes, is a signe of fatherly favoure. Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, because he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs: hee hath stricken vs, and hee will cure vs, because the hope of pardon is vsed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their sinnes. But their doting error is without all colour of reason, which to begin at repentance do appoint certaine daies to their new convertes, during the which they must exercise themselves in penance: & when those daies are once past, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospell. I speake of manie of the Anabaptists, speciallie those that marvellously rejoynce to be counted spiritual, and their companions the Iesuites, & such other dregs. Such fruits forsooth that spirit of giddines bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compass of a few daies, which a Christian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

3 But certaine learned men, even long before these times, meaning to speake simply & sincerely of repentance, according to the truth of scripture, have said that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and viuificatio. Mortification they expound to bee a forsow of the soule and feare conceived of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the judgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then hee trulie beginneth to hate and abhorre sinne: then he heartily misliketh himselfe, confesseth himselfe to bee miserable and lost, and wisheth himselfe to bee in an other man. Further, when hee is touched with some feeling of the judgement of God (for the one immediately followeth vpon the other) then he lieth striken and overthrown, then he trembleth, humbled & cast downe, downe, then he is discouraged and despayreth. This is the first part of repentance, which they have commonly called contrition. Viification they expound to bee the comfort that growth of faith, when a man overthrown with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterwa|ds vnto the goodnes of God, vnto the mercy, favour and salvation, that is through Christ, raiseth vp himself, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were fro death to life. And these words, if they have a right expostion, do aptly enough expire the nature of repentance. But where they take Viification for the cheerfulnesse, which the mind receives being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: for as much as it rather signifies a desire to live holily & godlie which growth of regeneration, as if it were faide, that man dieth to himselfe, to begin to live to God.

4 Some other, because they saie this word diversly taken in Scripture, haue made two sortes of repentance; and because they should make them differently knowned by some marke, they haue called the one Repentance of the Law, by which the sinner wounded with the fearing iron of sinne, & worn away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble & cannot wind himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospel, by which the sinner is indeed greeuously vexed with himselfe, but he raiseth vp higher and taketh holde of Christ, the salue of his soule, the corner of his feare, the hauen of his miserie. Of the repentance of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whole repentance when the scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greeuousnesse of their sinne, were afraide of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onlie as a reuenger and judge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine enterie of hell, whereinto they being entred into this present life, begane alreadie to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Majestie. The repentance of the Gospel, wee see in all them, that being galled with the spurre of sinne in themselues, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lorde. Ezechias was striken with feare, when he received the message of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, hee tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Ninivites were troubled with the horrible threatning of destruction: But they clothed themselues in sackcloth and ashes & prayed, hoping that the Lord might be turned to the & turned fro the furor of his wrath. David confessed he had too much sinned in numbring of people, but he said further, Lord take away the wickednesse of thy servant. Hee acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, & did cast himselfe downe before the Lorde, but therewithall he also looked for pardon: Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart, but trusting vpon the goodnes of God, they said furthmore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we do? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeede bitterly, but he ceasst not to hope well.

5 Although all these things be true, yet the very name of repentance
Cap. 3. Of the manner how to receive

The definition of repentance.

Acts 20:21. (To far as I can learn by the Scriptures is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend faith under repentance, it disagreeeth with that which Paul faith in the Acts, that hee testified to the Jews and Gentiles repentance vnto God and faith in Jesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance & faith as two diverse things. What then? Can true repentance flande without faith? No: But though they cannot bee seuered, yet they must bee distinguished. As faith is not without hope, and yet faith and hope are diverse things: so repentance and faith, although they hang together with one perpetual bond, yet they rather would bee conioyed than confounded. And truly I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easily appeare when the force and nature thereof shall bee declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is derived of convertering or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing it selfe doeth not ill agree with either derivations, whereof the summe is, that we departing from our selves should turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, shoulde put on a newe. Wherefore in my judgement, repentance maie thus not amisse be defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the spirit. In this sense are to bee taken all the preachinges wherein either the Prophets in olde time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onelie thing they trauelled to perswade, that confounded with their owne finnes, and pricked with feare of the Lordes judgement, they shoulde fall downe and bee humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendment returne into his right way. Therefore these wordes, To bee turned or returne vnto the Lorde, To repent, doe pence, are among them vset without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy historie faith, that men repent after the Lorde, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe beginne to follow his woorde, and are readie at their capaines commandement to goe whither hee calleth them. And John and Paul vset these wordes, to bring foorth fruittes worthis of repentance, for, to lead such a life as may reprent and testifie such an amendment in all their doings.

6 But before wee goe anie further, It shall bee profitable that we doe more plainly set out at large the definition that wee have made. Wherein there bee chiefly three points to bee considered. First when we call it a turning of life vnto God, wee require a transforming, not onelie in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put off her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring foorth the fruittes of workes agreeable to her renewing. Which when the Prophet goeth about to express, hee com- maundeth them whom hee calleth to repentance, to make them a newe hearte. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew howe the Israelites might repent, and soe rightely turned vnto the Lord, teacheth that it bee done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which manner of spea-

king we see often repeated of the Prophets) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, hee (maketh awaye all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceive what is the natural propriety of repentance than the fourth Chapter of Jeremiy. If thou returnest to me, O Israel, (saith the Lord) returneth to me, plow vp your arable land and sowe not upon thorns. Be circumciseth to the Lord, and take awaye the uncircumciseth skinnes of your heartes. See how hee pronounceth that they shall nothing preuaile in taking vp them the following of righteousnesse: ynes wickednesse be first pluckt out of the bottome of their heartes. And to move them thoroughly, hee warneth them that they have to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dalying, because he hath a double heart. Therefore saith saith the foolish endeavours of hypocrites, which did in deed busily go about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meanese time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednesse wherewith they held poore men fast tied. Where also he very wel theweth in what due-*ng vnfained repentance properly standeth. 7 The second point was, that we taught that repentance procedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the minde of a sinner be inclined to repentance, it must be stirred vp with thinking vp upon the judgement of God. But when this thought is once thoroughly settled, that God wil one day go vp into his judgement feare, to require an account of all sayings and doings; it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him vp to thinke vp a newe trade of life, whereby he may safely appear in that judgement. Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance, makest mention of the judgement: as in Jeremiy: least peraduenture my wrath go out as fire, and there be none to quench it, because of the naughtinesse of your worke. In Paulus sermon to the Athenians: And wheras hitherto God hath borne with you times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euer where may repent them, because he hath appointed the daie wherein he will judge the worlde in equitie. And in manie other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a judge, that sinners should thinke with themselues, that worse thinges hang ouer them if they doe not repent in time. You have an example thereof in the 29.G 0f Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring & hatred of sin, therefore the Apostle maketh forowfulnesses, such as is according to God, the cause of repentance. And he calleth forowfulnesses according to God, when we are not onlie afraid of punishment, but do hate & abhorre sin in selfe, forasmuch as we understand it displeaseth God. And no maruel. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, the forowfulnesses of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for the dulnes & forowfulnesses thereof, vnlesse God in stretching out his roddes shoulde pence more deeply. This is also an obstinacie which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the peruer-
Cap. 3. Of the manner how to receive

For though man's life were absolutely furnished with all points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may in deed be praised of the world, but in heauen it shalbe mere abomination, forasmuch as the chief part of our righteousness is to give God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our selues to yeeld de vs subject to his government.

3 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that we saie, that Repentance consisteth in two partes, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickning of the spirite. The Prophets do plainly expresse it, although somewhat simple and grossly according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they saie: Cease from e vil and doe goodnes. Againe: bee washed, be cleane, take away the euill of your works from mine eyes, Cease to doe peruerfly, learne to doe well, seek judgement, help the oppressèd, &c. For when they call men awake from wickedness, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednes and peruerse fesse. It is in deede an unceasie and hard thing to put off our selues, and to depart from our natural disposition.

Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly dead, vnlesse all that wee haue of our selues be abolishe. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enemie against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expresse the renuing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteousnesse, judgement and mercie. For it were not enough to do those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the heart haue first put on the affection of righteousnes, judgement and mercie. That is done when the spirit of God hath so sooked in new thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holines, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truely as we are naturally turned awake from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our selues do goe before, we can never go toward that which is right. Therefore we are so oft comman ded to put off the olde man, to forfake the worldly and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, & to be renued in the spirit of our minde. Moreover the very name of mortification doth put vs in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we therby gather that we are not other wise framed to ye feare of God, nor do leare the principles of godlines, but when we are violently slaine with the word of the Spirit, and so brought to nought even as though God should pronounce, that to have vs to be accounted among his childre there needeth a death of all our common nature.

9 Both these things do happen vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we do truly communicate of his death, by his power the olde man is crucified, and the body of sin dieth, the corruption of our former nature may live no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection, it is the we are raised vp into a newnes of life, that may agree with the righteousness of God. In one word I expounde repentance to bee regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence sowly defaced and in a manner vterly blotted out, may be renued in us. So the Apostle reacheth, when he faith: but we representing the glory of God with vncovered face are transformed into the same image, our glory into glory, as by the spirit of the Lord. Againe: Be ye renued in the spirite of your your minde and put on the newe man, which is created according to God in righteousnesse and holinesse of truth. Againe in another place: putting on the newe man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration wee bee by the benefit of Christ restored into the righteousnesse of God, from which we were fall'n by Adam. After which manner it pleaceth the Lord wholly to restore all those who he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one daie, or one yeare, but by continually, yea and sometimes slowly proceedinges God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, cleanseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renewing all their senses to true purenesse, that they may exercise themselves all their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthie raile & apostata Staphilus, which foolishly faileth that I confound the state of this present life with the heauenlie glorie, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holinesse and true righteousnesse. As though when anie thing is defined, we should not seeke the whole fulnes & perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increases: but I say that how were any man approcheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run at their life long.

10 The children of God therefor are so delievered by regeneration from the bondage of sin, not that having now obtained the full possession of libertie, they should seeke no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should haue remaining a continual matter of strife, wherwith they may be exercis'd, and not only be exercis'd, but also may better learne their own weaknes. And in this point all writers of sound judgment agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of evil, from whence continually spring desires that allure & stir him to sin. They confessse also that the holy ones are still holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot withstand but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to covetousnesse, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needful to labour much in searching what the olde writers haue thought herein, forasmuch as onlie Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfullie and with great diligence gathered all their judgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certaintie as they shall desire to learn of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to be this difference betwene him & vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithful so long as they dwell in a mortal body are so holden bound with lusts, that they cannot but lust, yet dares not call that disease sin, but being content to express it by the name of weaknesse, he teacheth then only it becometh sin, when either work or consent is added to couete or receiuing, yea, when wilfully doth to his first desire: but we account the very same for sin, yea is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, yea we affirm that the very corruption that ingredeth such desires in vs is sin. We teach therefore that there is alwaies sin in the holy ones until they be vncovered of the mortal bodie, because there remaineth in their flesh, a perseverance of lusting that fighteth against vprightnesse.

Col. 3.10.  1.Cor. 7.12.  2.Cor. 4.4.

Lib. ad Boni. 4.
Li.1. & 2. contra Julianum.
And yet he doth not alway forbear to vfe the name of Sinne, as when hee faith: This Paul calleth by the name of Sinne, from whence spring all Sinnes vnto a fleshy concupiscence. This as much as pertaineth to the holie ones, loofeth the kingdom in earth, and perfeth in heaven. By which wordes he confesseth, that the faftfull are guilty of Sinne, insuch as they are fubject to the lustes of the fleshe.

Therefore we fo say, that the olde man is cruified, and the lawe of Sinne abolisshed in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauinges, not to have dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in confidence of their owne weaknesses. And wee confefs that the fame are not imputed, as if they were not: but wee affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercie of God, that the holy ones are delivered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should iustifie bee reckoned Sinners and guilty before God. And this sentence it shall not bee harder for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are fufficient testimonies of the Scripture vpon their matter. For what would we have more plain, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romanes chapter 7: Fift both wee haue in an other place shewed, and Anguiſhe proveth by ftronge reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that bee veth these wordes Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake againft vs maie not cauill againft thofe woordes, but who canne denie, that a ftringing againft the lawe of GOD is euill, who can denie a withstanding of justice to bee Sinne? Finally, who will not graunt that there is a fault, where is a spiritual miferie? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, wee haue an afurred demonstration by the Lawe, by which this whole queftion may easily be discussed. For wee are commanded to loue God with all our heart, with all our foule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our foule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfi fee not the commandement that conceiue in their heart any desire be it never fo little, or suffer anie fuch thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie? For what are not the powers of the foule, to be affected with fodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these do open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not then that they are euene fo much void of the loue of God? Whencefore, who fo confefseth not that all the lust of the fleshe are Sinnes, and that the fame disease of lusting, which they call feeding, is the well spring of Sinne, he must needs denye that the transgression of the law is Sinne.

If any man thinke it an abfurde, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally moued in affection, are vniuerfally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answere, that wee do not condemne those desires that God hath so engraven into the minde of man at the first creation, that they cannot be rooted out without deftoieing the very nature of man, but only outrageous & vnbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now with by reason of the peruerse-nes of nature all her powers are infected & corrupted, that in all her doings appeareth a continual disorder & intemperance, because the desires cannot be euersed from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt.
Or (if you will take the whole sentence in fewer words) we teach that all the desires of men are evil: & we accuse them to be guiltie of sin, not in that that they are natural, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt & vncleane nature. And Augustin doth not so much varie from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much searcheth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometime forbeareth to vfe the name of sinne. Yet where he woteth that the law of sinne still remaining in the hollie ones, the onely guiltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doeth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We wil alleadge some other sentences, whereby that better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Iulian: This lawe of sinne is both released by the spirituall regeneration, & abideth in the mortall flesh, released herein, because the guiltines is taken away in the sacramet whereby the faithfull are regenerate: & it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sin (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is released in baptisme, but not ended. Againe, The law of sinne (of which yet remaining the guiltiness, is in baptisme discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickedness for the flesh to lust against the Spirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in respect of that guiltines wherin it held vs, & eu’n being dead, it still rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of burial. And yet plainer in the fifth book. As the blind-nesse of heart is both a sinne, whereby man beleueth not in God: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud heart is chastised with worthy correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart; so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lufterth, is both sin, because there is in it disobedience against the government of the mind: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is given for recompence to the deresyings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he consenteeth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Here without any doubtfull speech he callith it sinne, because when error was once ouerthrown, and the true reformed, he lefte feared slanderous reports.
As in the 41. Homely upon Iohn, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he saith: If in the flesh thou serue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselfe saith: let not sinne reigne in your mortall bodie to oose the desires thereof. He saith not, let it not be, but let it not reign. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needs bee in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it com-mandeth. They that defende that lust is no sinne, are woont to object that

Cap. 3. Of the maner how to receive saying of James, Lust, after that it hath conceived, bringeth forth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnlesse wee thinke that hee speaketh of onely ill workes or actuall sinnes, euil will it selfe, shall not bee accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischievous deeds & wicked offences the offsprings of sin, & giueth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euil thing and damnable before God.

14 Certaine Anabaptistes in this age, deuise I wote not what phantastike intemperance in stead of spirituall regeneration: saying that the children of God restored into the state of innocencie, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh; that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, ynder whose guiding they never goe out of the waie. It were incredible that mans minde couldie fall to so great madnesse, vnlesse they did openly & proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monstrous. But it is meete ye such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemies boldnesse, that so haue persauded their minde to turne the truth of God into a lie. Shall all the choose of honestie & dishonestie, right & wrong, good and euill, vertue & vice, be taken away? Such difference (faie they) commeth of the cursednes of old Adam, from which wee are exemped by Christ. So nowe there shall be no difference betweene fornication & chastitie, plane dealing & futeletie, treue & lyuing, justice & extortion. Take away vaine & are, faie they, the Spirit wil command thee noe euil thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yeeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common Learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lustes, haue put of all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spiritie do they belch out? For we rekonowledge one Christ, & his only Spirit whom the Prophets haue commended, whom the Gospell giuen vs doeth preach, of whom wee there heare no such thing. That Spiritie is no patronne of mankill, whoredom, drunkennes, pride, contention, couetousnes, & guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and treue. It is not a giddie spirit, & runneth headlong without consideration through right & wrong, but is full of wisdom, & understanding, that discerneth rightly betwenee iuft & vnjust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute & vnbridled licenciousnesse, but maketh difference betwenee lawfull and vnlawfull, and teacheth to keepe meare & temperance: but why doe we labour anie longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lorde is not a troublesome phantastie, which either themselues haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue received being forged of other: but they reverentie seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two thinges bee taught of him: First that he is giuen vnto sanctification, that hee might bring vs into the obediencie of God wil, being purged from vnleanenesse & desilings, which obedience cannot stand, vnlesse lusts be tamed & subdue, whereby these men would giue the bridale at libertie. Secondly wee are taught that wee are so cleansed by his sanctification, that wee are still besieged with many vices & much weakeenesse, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that beeinge farre distant from perfection, wee haue neede alway to encrease somewhat, and being entangled tangled in vices, we have neede daily to wrestle with them. Whereupó also followeth, that crying of sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedful mindes, that we be not compassed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peraduenture we thinke that we have proceeded further than the Apostle, which yet was wearied of the Angell of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weaknes: & which did unsanainly represent in his flesh that diuision of the flesh, and of the spirite.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth seven either causes or effectes or parts thereof, he doeth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeuer or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any abfurdistie, I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effectes. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affections joyned with repentance: but because, leaving out those questions, we may understand what Paul meaneth, we shall be content with a simple declaration of them. He faith therefore, that of the heauinesse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therefore all stirred vp to diligence & heedfulnesse, to winde himselfe clearely out of the snares of the duell, to take better heede of his snares, to fall no more from the governaunce of the holy ghost, not to be oppossed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the judgement of God, either doeth denie that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnes of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in crying of pardon, than in defence of his caufe. Like as the children that are not reproued when they acknowledge and confesse their faultes, do yet vse entreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all means that they ca, that they haue not cast away the reuerence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they goe not about to prooue themselues righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation thereby the sinner fretreth inwardlie with himselfe, quarreleth with himself, is angrie with himself, when he recordeth his owne peruersenesse & his owne vnthankfulnesse to God. By the name of feare, hee meaneth that trembling that is striken into our mindes so oft as we thinke both what we haue defered, and how horrible is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For wee must needs then be vexed with a mercuriall, vnquietenesse, which both intruisteth vs to humilietie, and maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Nowe if out of feare does spring that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then wee see with what linking they hang together. It seemeth to mee that he hath vsced this worde Defire for diligence in our dutie and readie carefulnesse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of our owne faultes ought cheefely to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which hee joyneth immediately next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearfulnesse, wherewith we bee kindled when we be spurreted forward with these pricking thoughtes, what haue I done? Whither had I throwne my selfe headlong, if the mercy of God did not help mee? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigorous that wee bee

C 5 to our
Cap. 3. Of the manner how to receive to our selves, & the straightlyer that we examine our owne sinnes, so much more we ought to trust that God is favourable and mercifull vs.
And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being staken with horror of the judgement of God must needs do some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly do feele what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselves, & other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes. But let vs remember that there is a measure to be kept, that sorrow do not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readiey happeneth to seareful consciences than falling to dispair. And also by that craftie meane whomsoever Satan findeth ouerthrown with dreade of God, hee more and more drowneth them in the gulf of sorrowe, that they may never rise vp againe. Truely the seare can not be too great which end-deth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway(as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he moue himself to the loathing of himselfe, he dispaire not, oppressed with too great fear, for so doe we flece away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Upon which point this lesson of Bernard is very profitable: Sorrow for sinnes is necessary, if it bee not continual. I counsell you sometime to returne your fault from greevous and painfull remembrance of your owne wayes, and to clime vp to the plaine grounde of chearefull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle hone with wormewood, that the holome bitternesse may bring vs health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetenesse.
And if yee thinke of your selues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lorde in goodnesse.
16 Now it may be also perceived what be the fruities of repentance, even the dueties of godlineesse toward God, and of charitie toward men, & therwithall a holinesse & purenesse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawes, so much the sorer tokens he sheweth of his repentence. Therefore the holy ghost oftentimes, when hee exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the com-mandements of the lawe, sometime to the dueties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned uncleannesse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies yet do set out true repentance, of which thing I will hereafter set before the readers cies atable in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather tes-rimonies out of the prophets, wherein they partly scorn at their follies that go about to appease God with ceremonies, & so thew that they bee mere mockeries; and partly do teach that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart: who so ever is euen meanly exercisid in the scripture shall perceiue of him selfe without any other mans putting in mindes, that when we haue to doe with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Joel shall not a little helpe to the understanding of the rest, where hee faith: Teare your hearts and not your garmentes. Also both those pointes are expressed in these words of Iames: Yee wicked doers, cleanse your hands: yee double men, purge your heartes. Where in-deede there is an addition joyned to the first part, but after is shewed the

The verie fountain and beginning that they must wipe away their secrete filthines, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Befide this there are also certaine outward exercises, which we vs privately as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, & publikely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to bee in lothomesse, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse & all trimming, and to for sake all delights. Then hee that feeleth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreover hee that well be thinking him, how grievous a thing it is to haue offended the justice of God, cannot rest vntill he haue in his own humility given glory to God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearsse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance. But albeit they doe not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shal pardon me, if I speake what I thinke it seemeth vnto me that they stand to much vpon them. And if any man will wisely ye w it, I trueth he will agree with mee, that they haue two waies gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, & with inmeasurable commendations aduanced that bodily discipline, this in deed they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that, which ought to haue bene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giuing punishments they were somewhat more rigorous then ecclesiastical mildnesse may beare, as we shal haue occasion to shewe in another place.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting & ashes spok en of, both often in other places & specially in Joel, they measure the chief part of repentance by fasting & weeping; therefore their error is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance; but weeping & fasting are not ioyned as continual or necessary effectes thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a special circumstance. Because he had prophesied, that there was a moit grievous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to prevent the wrath of God, not onely in repenting, but also in yttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arraigned, yeth humbly to abase himselfe with an overgrown beard, vncombed hair & blakke apparel, to moue the judge to pittie: so it behooved them when they stoode accused before the judgement seate of God in piteous array to befeech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peraduenture more fitly agree with those times; yet it is certaine, that weeping & fasting shold be to a very convenient good vs among vs, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamitie. For when he maketh any danger to appear, he doth after a certaine manner gue warning, that he is prepared or armed to revenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrimen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a little before, were had in examination. Even as y Pastors of the Church shoulde not doe ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging over the neckes of their people, they would cry out vpon them.
Of the manner how to receive them to make haste to fasting and weeping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principal point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway ioyned with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ ioyneth it with wayyling, when he acquiteth the Apostles from need thereof, untill the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. I speak of solemn fasting. For the private life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing & sobriety, that in the whole course there of may appeare a certaine kind of fasting. But because all this matter shall be to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreat of the discipline of the Church, therefore I doe now the more slenderly touch it.

18 But this one thing I will ad here by, the name of repenteance is aplyed to this outward profession, then it is vnproperly turned fro the natural meaning which I haue abowe set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning vnto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine & guiltinesse. So to do penance in ashes & sackcloth is nothing else, then to vster a displeasednes when God is angry with vs for grecuous offences. And this is a publike kinde of confession, whereby we condemn our selues before the Angels & the world, do present the judgement of God. For Paul rebuking their slouthisnes that tedely bear w their own faults, faith: if we did judge our selues, we should not be judged of God. But it is not alway necessary to make men openly of counsell and witnesss of our repentance: but to confess privately to God is a part of true repentance which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more unreasonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the sinnes in which we flatter our selues & do hide them by hypocrisy, lest he should bring them to light. And it behooueth vs not only to confess those sinnes which we daily commit, but more grecuous offences ought to drawe vs further, and to call againe into our remembrance things that seeme long ago buried. Which leffon David giueth vs by his example. For beeing touched with shame of his newly committed fault, he examineth himselfe even to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, & confesseth that euen then he was corrupted & infected with the fikthinesse of the flesh. And this he doth not to diminishe the hainousnes of his fault, as many hide them selues in the multitude, & seek to escape punishment by wrapping other with the.

But David doth farre otherwise which with simple plainnesse enforcest his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancy, he hath not cease to heape euils vpon euils. Also in another place he likewise examineth his passed life, that he craueth the mercy of God for the sinnes of his youth. And truely then only shall we prooue our droustinesse to bee shaken away from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, we ask relief of God. It is moreover to be noted, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that lifteth vp as it were from death, them that either haue filthily fallen, or with unbridled licentiousnesse haue thrown forth themselues to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious revolting, haue shaken off the yoke.

yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it rehearseth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threateneth mourning vs to sinners that have not done penance for their wantonness, fornication and unchastity. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare few are called to penance, a more than careless assurance should creepen vp vs, as though the mortifying of the flesh did no more belong vs, the care whereof the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, do not suffer vs to releafe. Therefore the speciall repentance which is required but of some, whom the Devil hath violently carried away from the fear of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Nowe if that be true, which is moste evidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiveness of sinnes: do we not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely justify them that be his, that hee may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness? John the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heauen is come neere at hande. In calling them to repentance, hee did put them in mind to acknowledge themselves sinners, & all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lorde, that they might with all their hearts desire the mortifying of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdom of God, he called them to faith. For by the kingdom of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgiveness of sinnes, salvation, and life, and all that ever we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Evangelistes it is written, John came preaching the baptism of repentance vnto forgiveness of sinnes. And what is that else, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lorde, and conceiue good hope of forgiveness and salvation? So Christ also beganne his preaching: The kingdom of God is come neere at hand: repent ye, and beleevie the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then hee requireth repentance, and last of all confidence in the promises of God. Therfore when he meant brealy to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he saide that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that repentance and forgiveness of sinnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised vp by God, to give to Israel repentance and forgiveness of sinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospell that all their thoughts, their affections, and their endeavours are corrupt & faulty, and that therefore it is necessary that they bee born againe if they will enter into the kingdom of God. Forgiveness of sinnes is preached when men are taught. Christ is made to them redemption, righteousness, salvation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous
and innocet in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are received by faith, as I have in another place declared; yet because the goodness of God whereby sinners are forgiven, is the proper object of faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from repentance.

20 Nowe as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of repentance, openeth vs the first enterie into Christ, which sweeth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which groan, labor, are laden, are hungry and thirsty, and pine away with sorrow and misery: so must we endue ourselfe toward repentance, throughout all our life applye it, and folowe it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to repentance; he was sent to bleste the unworthy, but so that every one should tune himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiveness of sinne, he likewise vext to require on our part repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them, Doe faith he? judgement and righteousness, because salvation is come neere at hande. Again, there shall come to Sion a redeemer, & to them that in Iacob repent from their sinnes. Again, Seek ye the Lord while he may be found: call upon him while he is neere. Let thine wicked leaves his way: & the wickednesse of his thoughts, & be turned to the Lord, and he shall have mercy on him. Again. Turn ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our repentance were a foundation to deferue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to have mercy upon men to this end that they should repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauel if they wil obtain grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrestle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our own natural soule. Plato saith in certain places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditatio of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christia[on] man is a perpetuall studye and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it being utterly slaine, the spirite of God get the domination in vs. Therefore I think that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike him selfe: nor that he should sticke fast in that mire & go no further, but rather that he should haue and long toward God, that being grased into the death and life of Christ, he should study upon a continuall repentance: as truely they cannot otherwise doe, that haue a natural hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sinne, vnlesse hee were first in loue with righteousness. This doctrine, as it was moste simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well knowne by the doctrine aboue taught, that I need not to repeate a long discourse to prove it againe. Therefore the Church prayeth and b橱e his admiration the benefite of God, that he hath given the Gentiles repentance unto salvation. And Paul commandinge Timothie to bee patient and milde towards the vndeceivers, faith: If at any time GOD give them repentance that they may repent fro the snares of the deuils God in deed affirmeth that hee wilde the conversion of all men, & directeth his exhortations generally to al men: but the effectual working thereof was from the Spirite
Spirite of regeneration, because it were more easy to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we are not without cause called, the worke of God create to good wootkes, which hee hath prepared that wee shoulde walke in them. Whomsoever the Lordes will is to deliver from death, those he quickekeneth with the spirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cause of salvation, but because it is already seene that it is vnseparable fro faith and from the mercy of God: fith (as Efsay testifieth) that there is a redeemer come to him, and to those in uoeb are returned from their wickednesse. This truely standeth stedfastly determined, that where ever liueth the feare of God, there the spirit hath wrought vnto the salvation of man. Therefore, in Efsay, when the faithfull complaine and lament that they are forfaken of God, they reckon this as a token of beeing reprobates, that their hartes were hardened by God. The Aposte also meaning to exclude apostatas from hope of salvation, appointeth this reason, that it is impossible for them to be renewed vnto repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perished, sheweth a token of his fatherly favour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with the beams of his cheerefull and merie countenance: on the other side with hardning them, he thundreth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is vnpartable. Which kinde of vengeance the Aposte threatneth to wilfull apostatas, which when they depart from the faith of the Gospeell doe make a scorne of God, reprochfully despiše his grace, and desile and tredse vnder the blood of Chrift, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doeth not (as some fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut of hope of pardon from all wilfull sinnes, but teacheth that apostatas is vnworthie of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that God doth punishte a contempt of him solfe so full of sacrilege, with vnslaueable rigor. For he faith that it is impossible, that they which haue once bene enlightened, haue tafted of the heauenly gift, haue bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tafted of the good worde of God, and the powers of the worlde to come, if they fall, shoule bee renewed to repentance, crucifying againe of newe, and making a scorne of the sonne of God.Again in another place:Is faith hee) wee willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth received, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. These also be the places out of the wrong understanding whereof, the Nauitians in old time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleuued this to be a counterfaite Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes do truly fauour of an Apostolike spirite. But because wee contenede with none but with them that alloewe it, it is easy to shewe, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their errour. First it is neceffarie that the Aposte agree with his master, which affirmeth that all sinne and blafphemye shall be forgien, except the sinne against the holic Ghost, which is not forgien neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Aposte was contented with this exception, vnlesse wee will make him an aduersarie to the grace of Chrift. Whereupon followeth, that... pardon is denied to no special offences, but only to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weaknes, and openly sheweth that a man is possest of the devil.

22 But to discourse this, it behooveth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall have no forgiveness. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth an obstinate stiffness even unto death, with despite of pardon, that doeth not well agree with the very wordes of Christ, that it shall not be forgiven in this world. For either that is spoken in vain, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustine's definition be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue even unto death. Whereas some other say that he sinnet against the holy Ghost, that enuie the grace bestowed upon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once proved with sure testimonies, shall easily by it suffice overthrow the all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resift the truth of God, with brightnesse whereof they are so dazeled, that they cannot pretend ignorance, which they doe only to this end to resift. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had saide, immediately addeth: He y speaketh a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgiven. And Matthew for the blasphemy against the holy Spirit, putteth the Spirit of blasphemy. But howe can a man speake a reproche against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that stumble vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which do ignorantly speake euill of Christ, haung yet this mind, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclos'd vnto them, or once with one wordc offend him, whom they had knowne to be the Lordes annointed, these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe moste hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospel, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of God, they would be ready to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is convinced, that it is the worde of God which they for sake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holy Ghost forasmuch as they wrestle against the enlightning that is the worke of the holy ghost. Such were many of the Jewes, which when they could not resift the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet endeavoured to resift. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zeale of the lawe, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage against God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to bee of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lord inuiteh, which to overthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemy, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapeth forth to reproch of the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he faith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorantly committed those things through vnbeleeue, for which otherwise he had bin vnworthy of Gods favoure. If ignorance joined with vnbeleeue was the caufe that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is ioned to vnbeleeue.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shalt perceiue that the Apostle speakeh keth not of one or other particular fal, but of the vniversal departing where by the reprobate doe forsake salvation. And it is no maruell, that they who John in his canonick Epistle affirmeth not to have bene of the elect, from whome they went out, doe feele God vnappereable. For hee direceth his speach against them, that imagined, that they might return to the Christian religion, altho' they had once departed from it: and calling them fro this false and pestilent opinion, he faith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christes, that wittingly and willingly have cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgresse the word of the Lord, but they that offer purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceite is in these wordes of falling and sinning. Because the Nouatians expound Falling to be, if a man being taught by the lawe of the Lorde, that he ought not to steele or to commit fornication, abstinence not from stealing or forniccation. But contrariwise I affirm, that there is a secrete comparison of contraries, wherein ought to bee repeated all things contrarie to that which was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular fault, but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when he faith, they which have fallen after that they haue once bene enlightened, and haue tasted the heavenly gift, and beenne made partakers of the holy ghost, and also tasted the good worde of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be understood of them, that with adusied vngodlineesse haue choked the light of the holy spirite, haue spit out againe the taste of the heauenly gift, haue estranged them selves from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnnder foote the wordes of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to expressse that adusied purpose of wickednesse, in another place afterward hee added this word by name Wilfully. For when he faith, that there is left no sacrifice for them, he finne willingly after knowledge of the truth received, he doth not deny, y Christ is a continuall sacrifce to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where hee declareth the priesthood of Christe) but he faith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospel is offer purpose renounced.

24 But whereas some doe thinke it too harde and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lordes mercy: that is easly aanswered. For hee doeth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lorde: but he orserly denieth, that they can rise vnto repentance, because they are by the juft judgement of God striken with eeuell blindnesse for their vnthankfulness. And it ma-kethe nothing to the contrarie that afterward hee applieth to this purpose the example of Esaus, which in vaine attempted with howling & weeping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophets, when they crye, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speche is meant neither the true conversion, nor calling upon GOD, but that carefullnes of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremity to looke vnto that which before they carelessly neglected, that there is no good thing for them but in the Lord's help But this they do not so much call upon, as they mourn that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation freteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophet that he will be mercifully to soone as the sinner turneth. And as I have already saide, it is certain that the mind of man is not turned to better, but by God's grace preventing it. Also his promise concerning calling upon him, will never deceive. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diversely drawn, when they see that they must needs seek God, that they may find remedy for their euis, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnpersonally called Conversion and prayer.

25 But a question is moued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained repentance, howe Ahab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whose yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to have bene onely struck amased with louden scare. He did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the grounde, and (as it is testified of him) hee was humbled before GOD: but it was not enough to cut his garments when his heart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet we see howe God is turned to mercy. I aunswere that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euery wrath of GOD lieth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Ahab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got hee thereby, but that he shoulde not seele it alieue in earth? Therefore the course of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and hee himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to bee scene in Esay. For though hee had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was granted him at his weeping. But because the spirituell inheritance, by the Oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refuseth that putting away did exclude the mercy of GOD: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that hee shoulde be fatte with the fat of the earth and the drawe of Heauen. And this is it that I said euem nowe, that it ought to bee referred to the example of the other, that wee should learne the more chearfully to apply our mindes and endeavorours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truly & heartily turned, God will bee ready to forgie vs, whose mercifulnesse extendeth itselfe euene to the vnworthy, so long as they shewe any greese at all. And therewithall wee bee also taught, howe terrible judgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which nowe make it a sport with no lesse shamelesse face than yron heart to despise and set downe by the threatnings of God. After this manner wee oftentimes reached out his hande to the children of Israel, to releue their miseries, although their crimes were counterfeit, and their heartes double and false, as him selfe in the Psalm complainteth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conversion, or to make make them vnexecutable Yet in releasing punishmentes for a time, he doth not binte himselfe to a perpetual lawe thereby, but rather riseth sometimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their pains, that thereby may appear how much faining displeaseth him. But (as I haue said) he shewed some examples of his readiness to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, & their pride may be the more greeciously condemned, that stubbornely kick against the pricke.

The iiiij. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their Schooles of Penance, is far from the pureneffe of the Gospell. Where it is esteemed of Confession and satisfaction.

Nowe I come to discouer those things, which the Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will runne ouer in as fewe wordes as may bee, because I minde not to goe through all, leaft this booke, which I labour to drawe into a short abridgement, should growe to a huge greatnesse. And the Sophisters have entangled it in so many volumes, being a matter otherwise not verie hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining, they shewe that they never understood what repentance was. For they take hold of certaine sayings of the olde writers, which doe nothing at all expressthat nature of repentance, as that to repent is to wepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to bee wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils passed, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented: Againe, that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in him selfe that which he is sorry to haue committed: Againe, that it is a sorrow of heart, and bitternesse of soule, for all euils that a man hath committed, or to which he hath consented. But, to graunt these things well saide of the fathers (which a contentious man might easie enough deny) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describ repentance, but only to exhorte them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had bene drawn. But if we lift to runne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adiouned as rightfully as they. As this of Chrystiane, Repentance is a medicine that destroiyeth sinne, a gift given from heaven, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the lawe. Yea and the doctrine which they afterwardteache, is somewhat worse than these definitions. For they finde so earnestly in outward exercises, that a man can gather nothing els out of infinit volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigorouenesse that trefeth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastise and punish vices: but they keepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is in deed much talk among them of Contrition and Attri- tion, they torment soules with many doubts, and do thrust into them much trouble and carefullnesse: but when they seeme to have thoroughly wounded the harts, they heal the bitternesse with a light sprinkling of ceremonies.
And when they have thus curiously defined repentance, they divide it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically than they defined it, although they would seeme to have wasted all their age in framing or lylogismes. But if a man will goe about to prove by the definition (which kinde of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may wepe for his finnes pasted, & commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaile his eulps pasted, and commit no more to be bewaile, and that he may punish himselfe for that which he was sorry to have committed, &c. although he doe not confeffe with his mouth: howe will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confeffe, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answere, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame me, but let them lay the fault in themselves that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my grossnesse) when any thing is disputed of, doe referre all things to the verie definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their mannerlike licence. Nowe let vs particularly consider all the partes in order. Whereas I do negligently leape over as trifles those things that they with great gravity of countenance do publish for mysteries, I do it not unwittingly, (neither were it very painfull for me to confute all that they think theselves to have deepe & futeely disputed,) but I would think it against conscience to weary the readers with such trifles without any profit. Truly it is easy to knowe by the questions which they moue and toffe, and wherewith they miserably encomber them selues, that they prate of things that they knowe not. As for example : whether the repentance of our sinne plesereth God, when obstinacy endureth in other. Again whether the punifhmenres layd vpon man by God, do availe to satisfaction. Again whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly finnes: where they lowly and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for veniall finnes. Likewise they verie much torment themselves with a groffe errour, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second bound after shipwracke, Wherein they shew that they never walked frō their brutish daules, to feele so much as a fare off the thousandth part of their faults.

2. But I would the readers should note, that here is not a quarrell about the shadow of an affe, but the moste earnest matter of all other is intreated of, that is to say, forgivenes of finnes. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that those three things are necessarie to the obtaining of forgivenesse of finnes. But if it hechooe vs to knowe any thing at all in all our religion, this truely behooueth vs moste of all, I meane to vnderstande and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, vpon what condition, with what easinesse or hardnesse the forgivenesse of finnes is obtained. If this knowlege stande not plaine and certaine, the confience shall haue no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurrednes, but continually trembleth, wauerevth, is troubled, is tormented. is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgiveness of sinnes hang upon those conditions to which they doe bind it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Contrition the first part of obtaining pardon, and they require that to be a true Contrition, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meantime they do not determine when a man may be assured, that he hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contrition, truly I grant that every man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himself, with bitterly weeping for his sinnes, to whet himself to more and more to a loathing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrow not to be repented, that breedeth repentance into salvation. But when there is such a bitterness of sorrow required as may proportionally anw are the greatness of the fault, and such as may in balance counter-pose with the truth of pardon, here the poore consciences are mercifully tormented & troubled, when they fee them selves charged with a due contrition of sins, and do not to attaine the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselves, if they have duly performed so much as they duly ought.
If they say that wee must doe as much as lieth in us, then come we all to the same point that we were at before: for how dare any man assure himself that he hath imploied all his force to bewail his sinnes? So when the consciences having long wrastled with themselves, and long been exercised with ballots, doe at length finde they have no rest in, yet somewhat to call themselves, they enforce themselves to a sorrow, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

3 But if they say that I slander them: let them come forth and shew any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either bene driven to despair, or hath not set for his defence a counterfaiting of sorrow in stead of true sorrow, against the judgement of God. Wee haue also our selfes saide in one place, that forgiveness of sins never commeth without repentance, because none but the afflicted & wounded with conscience of sinnes, can sincerely call upon the mercy of God: but wee haue therewithall further saide, that repentance is not the cause of the forgiveness of sinnes. As for those tormentes of soules, which they lay must be performed of due and, we haue taken them away: wee haue taught the sinner not to looke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne tears, but to sa-ffe both his eyes vpon the onely mercy of God. Wee haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the labouring and laden, when hee was sent to publish glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preache remission to captives, to deliver prisoners, and to comfort them in the mourne. From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, filled with their own righteounesse, doe not acknowledge their owne poorety, and al the despisers that carcleffe of Gods wrath doe seeke no remedy for their euilles.
For such doe not labour, nor are laden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captive. But there is great difference betwene a man to deferue forgivenuesse of sinnes with due and full contrition, which the sinner can neuer perfoure: and instructing him to hunger & thirst for the merice of G O D, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne

The pardon of our sinnes doth not depend upon the measure of our contrition.

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive vnquierenesse, wearinesse and captivitie, it may bee shewed him, where he ought to secke for reliefe, rest and libertie: and finallie, he may bee taught in the humbling of himselfe, to give glory to God.

4 Concerning confession, there hath beene alwaies great strife betwixt the Canonistes and the Scholediunyes: while the one forte affirme, that confession is commanded by the speciall commandement of God, & the other forte deny it and say, that it is commanded onlie by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesnesse of the diuines, that haue corrupted and violentlie wrested as manie places of scripture, as they alladge for their purpos. And when they say, that they could not so obteine what they required, they which would be thought more subtle then the rest escaped away with this shift, their confession came from the lawe of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward receivd forme of the lawe Positiv. Even as the foolishest fort among the lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the lawe of God, because it is saide: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception sayinge: The wife that thou gauest me. But that both citations and exceptions received forme given them by the Chiefl lawe. But let vs see by what arguments they proue this confession, eitherFormed or Unformed to bee the commandemente of God. The Lorde (say they) sent the leprous men to the Priests, But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer hard it spoken, that the Leuiticall Priests were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they fie to Allegories, And say: it was commanded by the Lawe of Moses, that the Priests shoulde discern betweene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spirituall leprosie therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce vpon it; Before that I answerd them, I ask it this way, If this place make them judges of the spirituall leprosie why do they draw to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshly leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The lawe giueth to the Leuiticall Priests the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpon us, Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Nowe I answere: sith the priesthood is remoued, it is necessarie that the Lawe be remoued also. All priesthoods are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthood is also remoued. If they love so well to followe allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape vpon his judgement feate the free jurisdiction of all things: this we can easilly bee contented to suffer. Moreover their allegorie is verie vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is meerey politike. Why then did Christ send the leprous men to the Priests? That the Priests shoulde not caull that he did breake the lawe that commanded the man healed of the leprosie, to bee shewed before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice, therefore he commanded the leprous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the lawe, Goe (faith he) and shewe your felues to the Priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commanded in the Lawe that it shoulde bee for a witness he vnto them. And truely this miracle should have beene a witness vnto them, for they they had pronounced them leprous, & now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christ's miracles? Christ leaueth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still daily with it, therefore this work is for a witness unto them. So in another place: This Gospel shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. Again: Ye shall be led before kings & governors, for a witness to them, that is, in the judgement of God they may be more strongly convinced. But if they had rather follow Chrysostome, he also teacheth that Christ did this for Jews false, that he should not be accounted a breaker of the lawe. Albeit so clear a matter I am ashamed to allege the witness of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leaueth the right of the lawe whole to the priests as to the professed enemies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not beene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priests may still keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessity be restrained by force; that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountain, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirm any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not pronounce that I can make a fairer shewe of them for my side, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lord commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they should unbind & loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie; for it is nowhere read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he saide to the Jews that stood by him, that the miracle might be made the more evident without suspicion of fraud, & his power appeare the greater, that without any touching, with his onely word he raised vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion from the Jews, willed them to roll away the stone, to seele the lyncle, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the only power of his word, and them first to seele him living. And this is the judgement of Chrysostome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lord gave his Apostles power to loose. But how much more fitly and more handily might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lord meane to instruct his faithful, to loose them that he had raised: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sinnes that he had forgotten; that they should not condemne them for sinnes whom he had acquited; that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiven: that they should not be rigorous to punish, & lightly offended, where he is mercifull & easily entreated to spare: Truely, nothing ought to move vs more to readiness to forgive, than the example of the Judge that therein he will be vnpeable to them that be too rigorous & vngentle. Nowe let them goe and boast of their allegories.

6 But nowe they joine more necesse hande with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to John's Baptisme, did confesse their sinnes, and James willeth that we confesse our sinnes one to another.

Of the maner how to receiue another. No marueile if they that woulde bee baptised did confesse their sinnes, for it was said before that John preached the baptism of repentance, and baptised in water vnto repentance. Whom should he then haue baptized, but them that had confessed the sequels sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiuenesse of sinnes: and who shoulde be admitted to this token but sinners, & they that acknowledge them sequels to bee such? Therefore they confessed their sins, that they might be baptized. And not without a cause doth Iamæ bid vs confesse one to another. But if they did make what followeth next after, they would understand, that this also maketh little for them. Confesse (faith he) one to another your sinnes, & pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutual confession & mutuall prayer. If wee must confesse to priests only, then must we also pray for priests only. Yea, what and if it might follow of the wordes of Iamæ that onely priests might confesse? for when he willeth that we should confesse one to another, hee speaketh onely to them that may heare the confessions of other: his word is in Greeke Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turns, or (if they so like best to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so interchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meeete to heare confessions. Which prerogative Sith they vouchsafe to graunt only to priests, we do also put ouer the office of confessting to them only. Therefore away with such triflings, & let vs take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple & plain: ye is, that we should lay our weakeesse one in anothers bosom to receive mutual counsel, mutuall compassion, & mutuall comfort one of another: that we being naturally privy to the weakesse of our brethren, shoulde pray for them to the Lord, Why do they then alledge Iamæ against vs: which do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? But no man can confess Gods mercy, vnlesse he haue first confessed his owne miserie. Yea we rather pronounce him accused that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, ye and before all men confesse himselfe a sinner. For the Lord hath concluded all under sinnes, that all mouths might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and wee onely justified and exalted.

7 But I marueile with what face they dare affirm, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the lawe of God: the vse whereof wee graunt in deede to be verie auncient, but such as wee are able to prove in old time to haue bene at liberty. Truely euen their owne cronicles declare, that there was no certaine Lawe or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient lawe, they would rather have taken hold thereof, than haue bin contented with the decrees of the councell of Laterane, and so made them selves to bee laughed at, euen of children. In other things they stick not to make forged decrees, which they father upo the most auncient Councels, that they may with very reverence of antiquitie dazzle the eyes of the simple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a false pack. Therefore by their owne witnesse, there are not yet pasted three hundred yeares since Innocent the third laied y snare vpon men, & charged them with necessity of Confection, But to speake nothing of the times the verie barbarousnesse of the worde s miniseth the credite of that law.
lawe. For where these good fathers command oneic one of both kindes, male and female, once every yeare to confess all his sins to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merily take exception, that in this commandement are contained oneic Hermaphroditus, and saie that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onlie. Since that time, a more grosse beastlines hath bewrayed itself in their scholers, they cannot expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoever al the Popes hyred bablers do prate, we hold both that Christ was never the author of this lawe that compelled men to reckon vp their finnes, & also that there passed a thousand & two hundred yeares from the resurrection of Christ before that anie such law was made. And so, that this tyrannie was then first brought in, when all godliness & learning being destroyed, the visors of Pastors had without choice taken all licentiousness vpon them. Moreover there are evidenc testimonies both in histories and other auncient writers, which teach that this confessed was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a lawe made by Christ or his Apostles. I wil alleadge but one out of manie, which shall be a plain proof thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitutio of bishops was diligently kept in all the West churches, but specially at Rome. Whereby hee sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all Churches. But he faie that there was one of the priests peculiarly appointed to serue for this office. Whereby hee doth sufficiently confute that which these men do sallie say of the keies giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthoode. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the special duty of some one that was chosen thereunto by the bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedral Churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hainous offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then hee faith immediatly after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman faining that she came to confession, was found so to have coloured vnder that pretence the vnhoneste company that she vse with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these akses lift vp their eares. If auricular confessio were the lawe of God, how durft Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schimmatike Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voyces of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemn the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not only let slip for a time, but also discontinued even till within time of his remembrance. Ye also let them condemn of apostasie not only the church of Constantinople, but also the East Churches which have neglected that law, which (if they say true) is inuiolable and commanded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation Chrysolome, which was also bishop of Constantinople, doth in so manie places evidently restifie, that it is maruell that these dare mutter to the contrarie. Tell (faith he) thy fins that thou maist do the a-waie, if thou be ashamed to tel any man the sins that thou haft done, tel the daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproach thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sins vpon Pfal. 50.
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive upon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognize her evils. Again; but now it is not necessary to confess when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy sins be done with thy thoughts: let this judgement be without witnesses: let only God see thee confessing. Again; I do not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow servants, I do not compel thee to disclose thy sins to men, rehearse & utter thy conscience before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the best surgeon, and ask of him. Shew to him that will reproach thee with nothing, but will most gently heal thee. Again; Tell not a man, least he reproach thee, for neither is it to bee confessed to thy fellow servant, that may utter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Philosopher. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call men to witness, tell thy sins to me alone privately, that I may heal thy sore. Shall we say that Chrysostome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliver mens confessions from these bonds wherewith they be bound by the law of God? Not so. But he dare not require that as of necessity, which he doth not understand to be commanded by the word of God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer & easier, first we will faithfully rehearse, what kind of confession is taught by the word of God: & then we will also declare their inventions, but not all (for who could drawe uprie such an infinite sea?) but onely those wherein they comprehend the sum of their secret confession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the old translator hath giveth in translation this word Confesse in stead of Praise: which the grossly vnlearned men commonly know; sauing that it is good to have their presumptuousnesse bewraied, that do give away that which was written of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannical commandement. To prove that confession availeth to cheare the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psalm: In the voice of reioicing and confession. But if such change may serve, then we shall have what we lift, proued by what we lift. But seeing they are so become past shame, let the godlie readers remember that by the just vengeance of God they have bin cast into a reproue mind, that their presumption should be the more detestable. But if we will rest in the simple doctrine of Scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceites to beguile vs. For therein is appointed one order of confessing, that forasmuch as it is the Lord that forgiveth, forgettest, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confess our sinnes to him for to obtaine pardon; he is the Philosopher, therefore let vs shewe our diseases vnto him. It is he that grieueth & offended, therefore let vs seek peace at his hand. He is the knower of hearts, and privie to all thoughts, therefore let vs make haft to powre out our hearts before him. Finally it is he that calleth finners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him. I have (faith David) made my sinne known vnto thee, and have not hidden my vnrighteousnesse. I haue said, I will confess against me my vnrighteousnesse to the Lord, & thou haft forgiven the wickednes of my heart. Such is the other confession of David. Have mercy vpon mee O God, according to thy great mercy. And such is the confession of Daniel: We have sinned, Lord we have done peruerely, we have committed iniquities, and haue bin rebellious in swaring from thy commandements. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in the Scripture, the rehearsal whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnnes (faith John) the Lord is faithfull to forgive vs our sinnnes. To whom should wee confesse euie to him; that is, if we fall downe with a troubled & humbled heart before him, if heartily accusing and condemning our selves before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodnes and mercie.

10 He that heartily & before God shall embrace this confessions, shall undoubtedly have both a tongue readie to confesse, so oft as it shalbe needed for him to publish the mercie of God before men, & not onlie to whisper the secret of his heart to one man, & once & in his eare, but oft & openly, & in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificence & glory of God. After this maner when David was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the sting of conscience, & confessed his sinne before both God & man. I haue (faith he) sinned to the Lorde, that is to say, now I alledge nothing for my excuse, I vs no shiftes, but that al men may judge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would haue had scret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glorie of God or for the huling of our selues. For this reason the Lorde in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speake the words, & the people sayin after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he forelew that this help was necessarie for them that every man might bee the better brought to a just reknowledging of himselfe. And meete it is that with the confession of our owne miserie we should among our selues, and before al the worlde, gi

11 And it is convenient that this kind of confession be both ordinary in the church, & also extraordinarily vued in speciall maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guiltie of anie generall fault. Of this second kinde we have an example in that solenn confession which al the people vued by the meanes and guiding of Esdras & of Nehemia. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City & Temple, the dissolving of religion, was the punishment of the common reuoluing of the al: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deluierance in such a fort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselves. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulness. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselves gather some infection & beare part of the blame. Therefore fo oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrenness or any other plague: if it be our due to flee to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltinesse; then confession it self, whereupon all these things doe hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinarie confession, beside that it is commended by the Lordees owne mouth, there is no wife man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For where as in all holy assemblies we make our apperance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning maie there bee of our pleading, but our re-

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive knowledge of vnworthinesse. But that (some man will say) is done by every prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confess our sinnes, I grant. But if you consider how great is our carelessnesse, or drowsinesse, or sluggishnes, you wil grant me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemn vse of confession, the Christian common people shoule bee exercised to humbling themselves. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Israelites, was parcel of the nurture of the law, yet in some manner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in well ordered Churches profitably observed, that every Sunday the minister shoule rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe & of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craveth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this key the gate to prayer is opened as well privately to euery man, as univerally to all men.

12 Moreover the Scripture alloweth two formes of private confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that saying of James is spoken, that we shoule confess our sinnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickedneses one to another, we shoule one helpe another with mutuell counsel and comfort. The other forme that is to be used for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if he haue in any thing beene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although James in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bolesome we should vnload our felues, leaueth vs a free choise, to confesse to him who shal seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the Church: yet we ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be judged meetest. I saie that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lord appointeth them by the verie calling of their ministry, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue & correct our sinnes, and also may receive comfort by trueth of pardon. For as the office of mutuell admonishment and reproving is committed to all men, yet it is specially enjoyned to the ministers. So when we all ought to comfort & confesse one another in confidence of Gods mercie, yet wee see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the forgiveness of sinnes, are ordained as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be saide to forgive sinnes and loose souls. When thou hearest this to bee ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profite. Therefore let euery one of the faithful remember this to be his duty, if he be privately so vexed & troubled with the feeling of sinnes that he cannot winde out him selfe without help of another, not to neglect the remedie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his relief to vse the private confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to crave the private helpe of him, whose duty it is both publiquely and privately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospel. But alwaies this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certainty, not to binde consciences with a certayne yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to bee free: not to bee required of all men, but to bee commended to those onelie that shal understande themselves to have need of it. Then that euery they that vse it for their need, shoulde not bee compelled by anie commaundement, or trained by anie deceit,
deeit, to reckon up all their sinnes, but so farre as they shall thinke it be-houseful for them, that they may receive sound fruit of comfort. Faithful Pastors ought not only to leave this libertie to the churches, but also to maintaine it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will have tyrannie absent from their ministerie and superstition from the people.

13 Of the other sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembrest that thy brother hath anthing against thee, leave thy gift there, and go, & first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and craving pardon of the offence that we have committed. Under this kind is contained their confession that have sinned euie to the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the private offence of one man, to forbid from holi mysteries all them that have sinned against their brother, til they be with just amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euil example, should recover the favour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian recei-ued againe to the communion, when he had yielded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vied in the old church, as Cypriian maketh mention. They do penance (faith he) in due time, & then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the bishop & the Cleary, they receive leave to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confession, the Scripture vterly knoweth not, & it is not our dutie to bind con-sciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I do so much not spake against it that the sheep should present themselves to their shepheard when they meane to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladlie haue it evry where observed. For both they that have an encombrde conscience, may from thence receive singular profit, & they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and su-perfition be away.

14 In these three kindes of confession, the power of the keies hath place: that is, either when the whole church with solemn reknowledging of their faultes craueth pardon; or when a private man, by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloses his weaknesses vnto him. But there are diverser waies of taking awaie offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is provided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be taken awaie, & mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this wch that I have spoken of, is not to be depiified, that we maie the more willingly confess our sinnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the judgement seate of God, con-fesseth it selfe guiltie, and hath one only refuge vnto the mercie of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christes embassador, having comendement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolutio pronounced vnto it. Here the profitablenes of the keies is worthily commeded, whence this embassage is performed rightlie, & with such order & religiousnes as
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

as becometh it. Likewise when he that had in a manner estranged himself from the Church, receiveth pardon and is restored into brotherly unity, how great a benefit is it that he understandeth himself to be forgiven by them, to whom Christ hath faide: To whomsoever ye forgive sins in earth, they shall be forgiven in heaven. And of no lesse effectualnes and profit is private abjuration, when it is asked by them that have neede of speciall remedy to relieve their weakness. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the general promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth nevertheless in some doubt, and hath stilt an vnquiet mind, as though he had not yet obtained pardoe: & the same ma, if he have disclosed to his person the secret same of his mind, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospel, Thy sins are forgiven thee, be of good hope, establisheth his minde verto assured: & is delivered from that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keies, we must take heed that we dreeke not of a certain power severed from the preaching of the Gospel. In another place we have occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we haue entreat of the governement of the church and there shall we see that all the power to bind and to loofe, which Christ hath giuen to his Church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mysterie of the keies, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospel be publikely & privately sealed vp in the heartes of the faithful, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which can not be done but by onelie preaching.

15. But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euery one of either kinde, so foone as they come to the yeeres of discretion, must yearely once at the least confesse all their sins to their owne priest: and that their sin is not forgiuen, vnlesse they have firmly conceived an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offered that they may do it, there is now no more entrie open for them into Paradise. And the priest hath the power of the keies, wherwith he may loofe and bind a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vain. Whatsoever ye bind, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselues. Some faie that there is but one keie in substance, that is the power to bind and loofe: and as for knowledge, that it is in deede requisite for a good vsr, but that it is onelie as an accessearie & not essentially joined with the other. Some other, because they saw this to be too much an unbridled licence, have reckoned two keies, discretio & power. Other againe, why they saw the leud boldnes of priests to be restrained by this moderation, haue forsook other keies, that is to saie, authoritie, of discerning which they should vsr in giuing determinate sentence: & power, which they shold practice in executing of their sentence: & knowledge standeth by as a counsellor. But they dare not simplicie expound this binding and loosing to bee to forgive and put awaye sinnes, because they heare the Lorde crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put awaye thy sinnes, O Israel. But they saie it is the priests office to pronounce who be bound or loofed, and to declare whose sinnes are forgien or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolveth and retaineth sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicateth & receive it againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they understand that they be not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be objected against them, that oftentimes their priests do binde and loose men vnworthie, which are not therfore bound or loofed in heaven; then (which is their last refuge) they answere that the giuing of the keyes, must be construued with a limitation, that is to saie, that Christ hath promised, that before his judgment seat such sentence of the Priest shall be allowed as hath bin unjustly pronounced, according as the desertings of him that is bound or looed, did require. Moreover, they saie, that these keyes are giuen by Christ to all Priests, and are delivered to them by their Bishoppes, at the time of their promoting to priesthood: but the free vs of them, remaineth onlie with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended Priests have in deede the keyes, but rustie and bound vp. And they that saie these things may well seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which upon a newe anuiall have forg'd newe keyes with which they saie the treasurie of the Church is locked vp. These keyes we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16 Now I will in few words answere to every one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, forasmuch as we will consider that when place serveth. But where they charge men with a lawe of reckoning vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgien but vp condition, if there be an intent conceiued to confess it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing bee neglected: this is in no wise to bee suffered. Must all sinnes be reckoned vp? But David, (Who as I thinke) had well studied vp the confession of his sinnes, yet cried out: who shall understand his errors? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in an other place. My iniquities have passed above my head, & like a weightie burden haue waxed heauie above my strenght. Truely he understood how great was the bottomlesse depth of our sinnes: how many were the fortes of our mischiefous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a tale she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon vp a registre of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cried vp to the Lord: I am overwelmed, I am buried and choked, the gates of hel haue compassed me, let thy hand drave mee out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and readie to die. Who now may thinke vp the numbring of his sinnes, when he saith that David can make no number of his?

17 With this butcherie, the soules that haue bin touched with anie feeling of God, haue bene more cruelly vexed. First they called them selfes to account: then they dividde sinnes into armes, into boowes, into branches, and into twiggges, according to these mens rules: then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumstancies. And so the matter went a little forward. But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on eche side skie, and on eche side sea, no hauen, no safe roade: he mo that they had passe over, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as high mountains, & there appeared no hope, not so much as after long. long compassings, any waie to escape. And so they did sicke fast betweene the sacrifice and the stone, & at last was found no other issue but desperatio.
Then these cruel butchers, to cause the wounds that themselves had made, laid certaine gentle plaisters, that every man should do as much as he could.
But new cares again rofe vp, yea new torment did fle the silly soules, as to think: I have not employed time enough, I have not endeauored my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I have paused ouer many things by negligence, & the forgetfulness commeth by negligence is not excusable. Then were there ministred other plaisters to affluage such pains, as, Repent thee of thy negligence; if it be not altogether careless, it shall be pardoned. But all these goings cannot close vp the wound, and are not so much easement of the evil, as poyson couered with honie, that they should not with their bitterness offend the first taff but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued.
Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth upon them & soundeth in their cares: Confesse all thy sinnes, And this horror cannot be appeased but by assured comfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring in to account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what sins they have done every day: for as much as experience prooueth to every man, that when at euening he shall reckon vp the faultes but of one daie, his memory is confounded therwith, so great a multitude & diversitie presenteth it self. For I speake not of grosse & blockish hypocrits that thinke they have done sufficiently, if they have noted three or foure of the greatest sins: but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which when they see themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, do add to this saying of John: If our owne heart do accuse vs, God is greater than our heart: & so they quake for feare at the sight of that judg, whose knowledge far surimounteth our understanding.

18 But whereas a great part of the world rested them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleuued that God was sattisfied, or because they themselues were fully sattisfied: but that the anchor cast as it were in the mid sea, should rest a little from failing; or as a wayfaring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For everie man maie be witnessse to himselfe, I will in a short summe shew, what manner of law this was. First simplic it is impossible, and therefore it can doe nothing but deflote, damn, confound, and cast in ruine & desperation. And then when it hath ledde sinners from the true feeling of their sinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselves. For while they are wholly busied in reckoning vp of their sinnes, in the mean time they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden iniquities, and inward filthines, by knowledge wherof they should chiefly have weighed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confess the bottomleffe depth of our cuil to bee so great as passeth our vnderstanding. After this rule we see that the Publicans confession was made. Lorde be merci-full to me a sinner; as if he should saie: All that euery I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I can not attaine with witte or express with tongue the greatness of my sinnes: let the bottomleffe depth of thy mercie swallow vp the bottom-
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 209

bottomlesse depth of my sin. But then thou wilt saie, what? are not all our sinnes to bee confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knitt't vp in these two wordees, I am a sinner? No, but rather wee muft endeavour our selues as much as in vs lieth, to pour out our heart before the Lorde, and not onelie in one worde confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and heartily acknowledge our selues to bee such: and with all our thought recorde, howe great and diuerse is our filth of sinnes, not onelie that wee bee vncleane, but what, howe great, and in howe manie partes is our vncleanesse: not onelie that we be debtors, but with howe great debties we be laden, and how many waies charged: not onelie that wee bee wounded, but also with howe manie and deadlie strokes wee bee wounded. With this reknowing when the sinner hath wholly powerd out himselfe before God, let him earnestly & sincerely thinke, that yet there remaine moe sinnes, & that the secret corners of their cuils are so depe, that they cannot be thoroughly disclosed. And he crieth out with David: Who understandeth his errors? Lord cleanse me from my hidden sinnes. Now where they affirme that sinnes are not forgiven, but with an intent of confesling firmly con-cieved, and that the gate of paradise is shut against him that negligeth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should grant them that. For there is no other forgiveness of sinnes, than alwaies hath beene. It is not read that all they have confessed their sinnes in the care of some priest, ye we read to have obtained forgivenes of sin at Christes hand.
And truely they could not confess, where there were neither any priestes confessors, nor anie confessing at all. And in manie ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time sinnes were forgiven without this condition. But that wee may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the word of God is plaine, which abideth for ever: Whene-souer the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this worde, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that judgement cannot bee giuen but when the caufe is heard, wee have a solution in readiness, that they doe presumptuously take that upon themselfes, which haue made themselves judges. And it is a maruel that they do so boldly frame to themselves such principles, as no man in his right wit will grant. They boast that the office of Binding & Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine injurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Moreover their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was vnknowne to the Apostles. Neither doeth it belong to the priest, but to him which doeth abolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as hee that heareth can ever knowe whether the reckoning be iust and perfect. So shoulde there be no abolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be judged.
Moreover the whole order of loosing and binding of faith and repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen vpon another man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of binding and loosing is not subiect to the judgement of an earthly judge: because the minister of the word, when hee doeth his office, can not giue abolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the sinnes fake,

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

Whose sinnes ye forgive, &c. that they should not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the commandement and worde of God, shall be ratified in heauen.

19 Therefore it is no maruell, if we condemn and desire to have utterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so malignant wares hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferently, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath given cause to so many wickednesse, sacrileges and errors, who will not thinke that it ought to bee presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vies, which they boast vp on as verie profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One only they commend with a singular prerogative, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made warre, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humbe a man with shamefastnesse enough when we call him to that high judgement seate of heauen, I mean to the hearing of God. It is forsooth verie well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge wee cease to sinne, and bee not ashamed to have God witnes of our cuill conscience. Although the verie fame is also most false, for it is to bee seen that by nothing growth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when men hauing made confession to a priest, think they may wipe their mouth and saie, I did it not. And not only they are made all the yeere long the holder to sinne, but all the rest of the yeere bearing themselves bolde vpon confession, they never sigh unto God, they never returne to themselves, but hauing sinnes vpon sinnes, till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they have once vomited them vp, they thinke them selves discharged of their burden, and that they have taken away from God the judgement that they have giuen to the priest, and that they have brought God in forgetfulness when they have made the priest privie. Moreouer who doth merily see the day of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerful heart, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backward, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawn to prison. Verie peraduenture he see the verie priests, that vse joyfully to delight themselves with mutuall rehearsals of their doings, as it were with merie tales? I wil not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth ful. Onelie this I saie, If that holy man did not unwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confession out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flock: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to bee done at this daie vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incests, and bawdries.

20 Where the Confessors alledge for this purpose the power of the keys, and doe thereupon set the peupel and proue of their kingdome, as the proverbe is: it is to be seen howe much they ought to auail. Then (faie they) are the keyes giuen without cause? Is it saide without cause: Whateuer you looke vpon earth, shall bee also looed in heauen? Doe we then make the worde of Chriu vnde? I auowe there was a weightie cause why the keyes should bee giuen, as both I haue euene now already decla.

For Chriftdidnotgiuchis declared, which Ic CO Qfwhatfoeuerdorctheyboaftthat bine powerisgiucntocuilldifpocersofit. dcnie coramaunded akc none they ther thou thie, they mentes, IjeOhofttobeavaine worde is Ghoft.Idenic moftof Church worthie whereas to promife, haue that confefTe, haue of the kingdomeofGod, and embrace the grace of Chrift. Whereas to promife, haue of that and according to good. Neither the promise of Chrifm Ys binde, or loofe. Neither maie they dallie & faie, that the yaying of Chrif is limited according to the deserings of him that is bound or loofed. And wee also confefTe, that none can bee bounde or loofed, but they that are worthie to bee bound or loofed. But the messengers of the Gofpell and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this woorthineffe, in this worde the messengers of the Gofpell may promise to all men forgivencesse of Sinnes in Chrift by faith, they maie proclaime damnation into all and vpon all that embrace not Chrift. In this worde the Churche pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, theuces, manfleyers, couteous men, vntrusted men, haue no parte in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with most sure bonedcs. With the same woorde the Church looseth them whom it comforteth beeing repentant. But what power shall this bee, not to know what is to bee bounde or loofed, and not to bee able to bine or loofe without knowledge? Why then doe they faie that they loose by authoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vnccertaine? What haue wee to do with this imaginatiae power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it alreadie prooved that either there is no vse of it, or so vncertaine an vse as maie be accounted for none at all. For whereas they confesse that there is a great part of Priests that doe not rightlie vse the keyes, and that the power without lawfull vse is of no effect. Who shall assured mee that he of whom I am loosed is a good vse of the keyes? if hee be an euill vse of it, what hath hee else but such a voide disposing of them, as to faie, what is to be bound or loosed in thee I know not, forasmuch as I lacke the right vse of the keyes, but if thou deserue I loose thee. But so much might doe, I will not faie a laie man (for they could not beare that with patient cares) but a Turke or a Diuell. For it is a much as to faie, I have not the worde of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power given mee to loose thee, if thy deseruings be so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keyes to bee the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing: and that knowledge is adjoyned for a counsellor, and like a counsellor scruteth for a good vse: vn doubtedly even they desired to raigne at their owne will, licentiously without God and his word.

22. If anie man take exception and faie, that the lawfull ministers of Chrift shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangeth vpon faith shall alwaie remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall have either none or a colde comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competet judge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: wee have answere thereunto in readiness. For they faie that no sinnes are forgiven by the priest, but such whereas of himselfe hath bene the hearer; so by their opinion, the forgiveness hangeth vpon the judgement of the priest, & if he doe not wisely discerne who be worthie of pardon, the whole doing is void and of no effect. Finally the power wherof they speake, is a jurisdiction adjoyned to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restraine. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomlesse depth. For where the confession is not found, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the priest himselfe must needs sticke in suspence while hee can not tell, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the euill deedes. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of priests) the most part are no fitter to doe this office, than a homemaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a maner all ought worthily to suspect themselues. Hereupon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulness of the Popes absolution, because they will have it grounded vpon the person of the priest, & not only that, but also vpon knowledge, that he may judge only of things informed, examined and proved. Nowe if a man shoule aske of these good doctors, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiven: I see not what they have to answere, but that they shal bee compelled to confesse that all is vnprofitable, that the priest pronouceth of the forgiveness of those sinnes that he hath reheard, so long as the other sinnes are not deliuered to condemnation. On the behalf of him that confesseth how hurtful careufulness holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he resteth vpon the priests discretion, as they call it, hee can determine nothing certainly by the worde of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleare from all these absurdities. For the absolution is conditiditionally, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifully vnto him, so that hee sycerely secke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, & obey the grace offered him. So hee can not erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclameth that which is giuen him in instructions by the worde of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annxed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the maister himselfe, Bee it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath beene wickedly despised in the Papacie.

23. How foolishly they confounde those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of keyes, I have promised that I will speake in another place, and there shall be a more convenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the gouernement of the church. But let the readers remember that those things are wrongfully wresed to Auricular and secreete confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospel, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they object that the power of looing is giuen to the Apostles, which priestes may use in forgiving sins acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a falle and fonde principle, because the absolution that seerueth faith, is nothing else but a witnesse of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospel. As for the other confession, that hangeth upon the discipline of the Church, it dependeth nothing to seerueth sinnes, but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken awaie. But whereas they scrape together here & there testimonies, to proue that it sufficeth not to confesse sinne either to God onlie or to laie men, vnlesse a priest be the heare of them, their travell therein is but leawd, and such as they maie bee ashamed of. For when the auncient fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselves to their owne pasture, it can not be expounded of particular rehearsal which then was not in vse. Then, Lombard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme of fette purpose to haue giuen themselves to fained bookes, by pretence whereof they might deceive the simple. They doe indeede truely confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although hee haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the priest doeth not so much forgive sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Albeit in the word of declaring they slie bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremonie in stead of doctrine. But whereas they patch vnto it, that he is absolved in the face of the Church that had alreadie obtained pardon before God: they do inconueniently draw to the pecuilar vse of euery particular man, that which wee haue alreadie saide to bee appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to bee taken awaie. But by and by after, they depraye and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgiving, with an enioynge of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to part that in hales, which GOD hath in all places promiseth vs whole together. For when hee simplicie requireth repentance and faith, this partition or exception is a verie robberie of God. For it is ineffect as much as if the priest taking upon him the person of a Tribune, should become intercessour to God and woulde not suffer God of his meere liberalitie to receive him into fauour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seats and there hath bin punished.

24. The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they will make God the author of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falsehood condemned, as I have proued them false forgers in the fewe places that they alleadge. But sith it is evident that it is a lawe made by men, I say that it is both tyrannical & made iniuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his worde, will have them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lordde woulde to bee free, I saie that this is a sacriledge not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properlie belonging to God, than to forgive sinnes, wherein consi?itth salvation for vs. Morcoter I haue shewed that this tyrannic was first brought in, when the worldes was oppressed with filthie barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent lawe, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore soules in whom feeuer abideth a feate of God: or where there reigneth carelesnes, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, & so maketh the dower. Last of all I haue declared, that whatsoever mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and deprawe pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitfull colours.

25. The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, wherof all that euer they babble may bee ouerthrown with one worde. They saie that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to abstaine from his former euils, and change his behauiour into better, vnlesse he make satisfacti?on to God for those thinges that he hath done: And that there be many helps by which wee may redeem our sinnes, as weepings, fastings, oblations and the workes of charitie. With these we must winne the Lordde to bee favourable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousness of God, with these we must make amendes for our defaultes, with these we must desyre pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercie hee hath forgien our fault, yet by the discipline of his justice he reteneth the paine, & that this is the paine that must bee redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they falsehood to this point, that wee doe indeed obtayne pardon of our sinnes at the mercifull effe of God, but by means of the deserting of our works, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompen?ed, that due satisfaction may bee fully made to Gods righteousness. Against such lies, I saie the free forgien effe of sinnes, than which there is nothing more euidently spoken of in the scripture. First, what is forgienes, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgie, he acknowledgeth by acquittance that the mony is paid, but he saith without any payment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the debtors bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away al opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what when the Lord crieth out by Esai? It is, it is, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will will not be mindfull of thy sinnes: doest he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgiuenece anlone from his own goodnes? Moreover whereas the whole Scripture beareth this wittesce of Christ, that forgiuenece of sinnes is to be receuied by his name, dooth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then doe they teach that it is receuied by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they give this to satisfactions, although they faie that the same be vsed as helpe by waie of meanes. For whereas the Scripture faith, By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we alledge nothing of our owne, but rest vpon the only commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirneth that God is reconciling the world to him selfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sinnes, he immediatly theweth the meane & maner how, because he that was without sinne, was made sinne for vs.

26 But (such is their peruerstie) they say that both forgiuenece of sinnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme receuied into the fauour of God by Christ: that after baptism we must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profite the thing, but as far as it is distributed by the keyes of the Church. Neither do I speak of a doubtful matter, forasmuch as they have in most euideu cy writings bewraied their own filthines, & not one or two of them, but all the Schoole-men univerually. For their matter after that he had confessed that Christ had paied the penalty of sinnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Per- son, immediately correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in baptism all temporal penalties of sinnes are released, but after baptism they are minished by the help of penance, that so the crosse of Christ and our penance maie worke together. But John faith farr else otherwise, if any sin, wee haue an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our sinnes, I write vnto you children, because your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. Truelie, hee speakeast to the faithfull, to whom when he setteth forth Christ to be the propitiation of sinnes, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God being displeased, maie be made fauourable and appeased. He doeth not faine: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, nowe secke you other meanes, but hee maaket him a perpetuall advocate, alway to restore vs by his intercession into the fauour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our sinnes maie be cleansed awaie. For this is euery true that the other John faide: Beholde, the Lambe of God, beholde him that taketh awaie the sinnes of the world, He taketh them away (faith he) him selfe and none other, that is to say, for as much as he alone is the Lambe of God, hee alone alfo is the oblation for sinnes, he alone is the propitiation sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgiue belongeth properly to the father, in the respect that he is distinguishe from the sonne, as we have alreadie seen: Christ is here set in another degree, that taking vpon him selfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltinesse before the judgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we haue no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, vntleffe the same honour remaine whole with him, which they doe wrongfully take to them selves that goe about to appease

God with their owne recompensings.

27 And heere it is good to consider two thinges: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and unminished: and that the confiences being assured of the forgiuenesse of sinne, may haue peace with God.

Esaie faith, that the father hath laide the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that we shoulde be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes faith: that Christ did in his body beare our sins vpon the tree.

Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sin for vs. That is to saie, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was givene to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sins with all their malediction & curse, with the dreadful judgement of God, and condemnation of death shoulde bee cast. Heere those trullings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, every one of vs doth none other wise seele the effectuallnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance; but so oft as we fall, we bee called backe to the onelie satisfaction of Christ. Nowe set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuenesse of sinnes: that if we afterward fall, to the obtaining of a second forgiuenesse our workes doe woorke with it. If these thinges may haue place, do these things that are here before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It is a marvellous great difference, between this that our iniquities are laid vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, & this that they are cleansed by our owne works: betwene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if wee speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to haec that his sinnes are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, hee shall alwaies be vexed, and alwaies quake for feare. For they that rest vpon light pettie satisfactions, doe too contemptuously esteeme the judgement of God, and doe little consider how great is the grievousnesse of sinne, as wee shall declare in another place.

But although we grant them to redeeme some sinnes with just satisfaction; yet what wil doe when they are opprest with so manie sinnes, for satisfaction whereof an hundred lies although they were wholly applied thereto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuenesse of sinnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yonglinges, but to the alreadie regenerate children of GOD, and them that haue beene long nourished in the bo-some of the Church. That embassadoge which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that haue beene alreadie regenerate. But he, bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the blood of the crosse hath pacicified all things in heauen or in earth, wee refrained not this to the onelie moment wherein we are received into the Church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easly appeareth by the processe of the text, where hee faith, y the faithful have a redemption by the blood of Christ, that is for-giuenneses of sinnes: Albeit it is superfluous to heape together more places, that readily readily offer themselves to be founde.

28 Heere they fle to the sanctury of the foolish distinction, that some sines are veniall, and some deadly: that for deadly sines is great satisfaction due, that veniall sines are purged with more eay remedies, as with saying of the Lordes prayer, with prinking of holy water, with abolution at the masse. So they mock & trifle with God. But whereas they alway have in their mouth veniall and deadly sine, yet they could never discern the one from the other, suyng that they make vngodlines and vncleanees of heart a veniall sine. But we (as the scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) doe pronounce, that the reward of sines is death, and that the soul that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the sines of the faithfull are veniall, nor for that they doe not deserve death, but because by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, because they are not imputed:because they are taken away by pardon. I know howe vniustly they slander this our doctrine. For they say, it is the Stoiks stra g conclusion, concerning the equalitie of sines. But they shall easilie be convinced by their owne mouth. For I demand of them, whether among the very same sins that they confess to be deadly, they do not acknowledge one to be greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately followe, that sines are equall, because they are altogether deadly. When the scripture definitively saith, that the reward of sines is death, that the obedience of the Lawe is the way of life, and that the tresgreession of the law is death, they can not escape this sentence. What ende of satisfying then will they find in so great a heap of sines? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sine, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrap the selues in many sines, with the iustest man passeth no one day wherein hee falleth not many times. Nowe when they shall prepare themselues to make satisfaction for the sines, they shall heape vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfying being cut of, what do they stay vpon? how dare they still thynke of satisfying?

29 They goe about to winde out themselues: but (as the proverb is) the water still cleaeth upon them. They forge a distiction of fault and penalty. They confess that the fault is forgiven by the mercy of God, but that when the fault is forgiven, the penaltie remaineth which the rightouesnes of God requireth to be paid: and that satisfaction doe properly belong to the release of the penalty. Good God, what a skipping lightenesse is this; now they confess that the forgiveness of the fault lieth freely open for men which sometime they teach men to defere with prayers and weepinges, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet still, all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgiveness of sines, doth directly fight against this distinction, Which although I thinke that I have alreadie more than sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherewith these winding snakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not be able once to folde in the toppe of their tale. This is the newe Testament which the Lorde hath conuantaunted with vs in his Christ, he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these worde, we learne by another Prophet, where the Lord saith: If the righteous turne away from his rightouesnesse, I will
I will not remember all his righteousnesses. If the wicked depart from his wickedness, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he faith that he will not remember their righteousnesses, this is as much to say, that he will have no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember sins, is as much as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behind his back, to wipe it away like a cloud, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such manner of speech the holy ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning unto vs, if we would apply it to him willing to learne. Truely, if God do punish sinnes, he imputeth them; if he taketh vengeance, he remembereth them; if he call them to judgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine them: he doth not cast them behind his backe: if he looke upon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloude, if he lift the, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordes. If God have covered sinnes, then he would not looke upon them: if he would not looke upon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, hee had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were covered, that they should not be scene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs here also out of another place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lorde forgiueth sinnes. If (faith he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shall bee made white as snowe: if they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. And in Jeremy wee reade thus: In that day the iniquitie of Jacob shall be sought for, and shall not be founde: the sinne of Judah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remaunts that I shall preferre. Will thou briefly understand what is the meaning of those wordes? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches, that the Lord doth bind vp iniquities in a sack, doth gather them into a bundell and lay the vp, and doth grave them with an yron pointell in an Adament stone. If they signifie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shall be given for recompence, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompensing of vengeance. Heere I must before the Readers not to harken to my glosse, but onely that they will suffer the wordes of God to take some place.

What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did bear all our sins in his body vpon the tree, we mean nothing else thereby, but that he suffered all the pain and punishment that was due vnto our sinnes. And the same hath Ephes more luely declared where he faith: the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vppon him. What is the correction of our peace but the pain due to sinnes? but which we should have suffered before that we could be reconciled to God? Ynleas he had entred into our stead: Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffered the paines of sinnes, to deliver them that were his from them. And so as Paul inaketh mention of the redemption perfourmed by Christ, hee vseth to call it in Greeke Apolustrofis, whereby hee meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the verie price price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gave himselfe Antithesis, a price of ransome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lorde (faith Augustine) but sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death in Christ? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of sinnes, ministreth vs a strong battell against. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that manner of satisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doeth most diligently and in most exact order sett out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe commeth it to pase, that he commandeth to recompence faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth only sacrifices for satisfaction, but because his will is so to declare, that there is onely one kind of satisfaction, whereby his judgement is appeased? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their truth, that is to say, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what manner of recompence the Lorde receiueth of vs, Osee hath verie well expressed in few wordes. Thou shalt (faith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Lo, heere is forgivenesse of sinnes. And we shall pay thee valnes of our lippes: Lo, here is satisfaction. I knoewe that they yet doe subtly slippe away, when they make distinciton betwene euerlasting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of punishment that God taketh as well of the body as of the soule, except onely euerlasting death, this restraining of it doth little help them. For the places that we have above restated, doe expresslie meane this, that God receiueth vs into fauour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardonest all the paine whatsoever wee have thereby dererued. And so oft as David or the other Prophetes doe crave pardon of sinnes, they do also therewithall pray to be releafed of the paine. Yea, the verie feeling of God's judgement doth drue them thereunto. Againe, when they promise mercy at the Lords hand, they do in manner alwaie of purpose preach of the paines and the forgivenesse thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne sake, not for the Jewes sake, he doth sufficientlie shewe that both are of free gift. Finally, if wee be delivered by Christ from guiltines of fault, the paines that come thereof, must needs ceafe.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arm themselves with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of arguments those be that they allege. David (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie & manslaughter received pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterward punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. Wee are taught to redeem with satisfactions such paines as were to be extended after forgivenesse of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebu hadner to redeem his sinnes with almes, and Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlineese, iniquities are forgiven. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is covered. Which sentence Peter also confirmineth. Againe, in Luke the Lorde faith of the woman that was a sinner, that many sinnes are forgiven her, because she hath loued much. Howe peruerslie and wrong

Of the maner how to receiue the doings of God, But if they had marked (as they should not have overpa.ssed it) that there are two kinde of God's judgment, they would have scene in this rebuking of David, a farre other maner of punishment, than such as might be thought to tend to reuengement.

But because it not a little behoueth vs to vnderstand wherunto the chastifements haue respect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our finnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shall be not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kinde of judgement, the judgement of reuengement, the other of Chastifement; it is to be vnderstood, that God so punisheth his enemies with the judgement of reuengement, that he vseth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is joyned with his indignation: with the judgement of chastifement he dealeth not so cruelly, as to bee angrie nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a judge, the other of a Father. For the judge when hee punisheth an evil doer, he hath regard to the offence, and punisheth the verie fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his childe, hee doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teache him, & make him warier in time to come. Chryfoste at a certaine place vseth a similitude somewhat differing from this; but yet it commeth to the same point. The sonne (faith he) is beaten, and the seruant also is beaten, but the one is punished as a bondseruant, because he hath offended, and the other is chastised as a free man and as a sonne needing correction. To the one his correction serueth for proffe and amendment, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

But that we may haue the whole matter shortly & in a ready summe, let this bee the first of two distinctions. Wheresoever punishment is to reueng; there sheweth it selfe the curse and wrath of God, which hee alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwise, Chastifement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimony of his love, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commounly every where sufficiently expressed in y word of God. For whatsoever afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out unto vs as it were a certaine entrie of hell, to whence they do already see a farre off their eternall damnation: and they are so far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginnings they are prepared to the most cruel hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chasticing chasteth his seruants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confess that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them unto true instruction. But as we read euerie where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quieter mind, so they have alway praised to escape the first kind of scourges. Chastice me Lorde (faith Iere-my,) but in thy judgement, not in thy wrath, least thou destroy mee. Pour out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowne thee, and vpon the kingdomes.

kondomes that have not called upon thy name. And David saith: Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrary, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth their sins. As in Esay: I will confess to thee, O Lord, because thou hast ben angry with me: thy wrath is turned, & thou hast comforted me. Again. Habacuc. Thou that hast ben angry shall remember mercy. And Michael: I will bear the wrath of the Lord, because I have sinned against him. Where hee putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull have allwage of their sorrow, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that he doeth desile his own inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he wil never desile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God y punisheth, but of the vehement feeling of sorrowe which they feele that suffer any of his feuerity whatsoeuer it be. But hee not onely priceth his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselves not far from the damnation of hell. So heestifieth that they have desere of his wrath, and so it behooueth that they shoulde loathe themselves in their euils, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make haft to crave pardon. But euin in the verie same doing he thweth a more euent testimonye of his fauourable kindenesse than of his wrath. For the covenaut continueth that was made with vs in our true Salmone: the truth wherof he cannot decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall never be made voide. If (faith he) his children forsake my law, & walke not in my judgementes: if they desile my statutes, and keepe not my commandements. I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes; but I will not take away my mercy from him. Of which mercy to make vs assured, hee faith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the posteritie of Salmone, shall bee of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreme and deadly horror, that feele the had of God to be against them. How great regard hee hath of this lenitie in chastising his Israel, he thoweth in the Prophet: I have purged thee (faith he) in fire: But not as Silver, for then thou shouldest have beene al consumed. Albe it hee teache that chasticements serue him for to cleanse him, but he further faith, that hee vseth the same so temperatly, that hee bee not too much consumed by them. And that is needesfull. For the more that every man reverently feareth GOD, and giueth himselfe to followe godlinesse, so much the tenderer hee is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groane under his scourges, yet for that they weigh not the caufe, but rather turne their back both to their owne sinnes and to the judgement of GOD, by that slothfulnesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmure and kicke against him, and doe make an uprore against their judge, that furious sudden rageastonisheth them with madnesse and futor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by & by descend to consider their sinnes, and being striken with dread and horrour, they flee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, vnlesse the Lord.
Of purpose for

God punished the wicked to be reuenged on them for having sinned, but his children to make them careful not to sinne.

In firm.de parnit. & confess.

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

Lorde did asswage these forrowes wherewith the poore soules torment themselves, they woulde faint a hundred times euie in small tokens of his wrath.

Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are striken with the scourges of God, they doe already after a certaine manner begin to suffer paines by his judgement, and though they shall not escape unpunished, for that they have not taken heed to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they should proue God to be a judge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they should thereby bee punished of God for their sinnes, but that they should thereby profite to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather haue respect to the time to come, then to the time past. This I had rather expresse in Chrysostomes wordes than mine owne. For this (faith hee) God doth lay paine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so faith Augustine : That which thou sufferest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chastifement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt nor be put away from the inheritance, &c. Knowe ye brethren that all this miserie of mankind when the world groweth is a medicinall sorowe, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I have therefore thought good to allege, that the manner of speech that I have aboue written, shoulde not seeme to any man new & vnused. And hereunto_SERVER, all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lorde oftentimes doth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stifely despised all punishments. In Epist. hee faith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to the crown of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophetes are full of such sayings, it shall be sufficient to haue breefeley shewed that God doth punishe his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amended. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdom, hee punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from David his yong sonne, hee corrected him to amendment. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul faith, wee are judged of the Lorde, wee are corrected that wee should not be damned with this world. That is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heavenly Father, this is no paine wherewith wee should be confounded, but only a chastifement whereby we should be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainely on our side. For he teacheth that the pains wherewith men are like chastised by God, are diversely to be considered: because to the holy ones they are to be considered as much...

as much as if he had said: Because ye have already suffered paines enough, and by the grace of God and multitude thereof have been nowe pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is nowe time that receiving the tidings of full mercy, your hearts should rejoyce and feel me to be your father. For there God did take upon him the person of a father, which repenteth him even of his just seueritie, when he was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessary that the faithful be furnished in bitterness of afflictions. It is time that the judgement began at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called upon. What should the children of God do, if they did beleue the seueritie of God that they feel to be his vengeance? For he that being striken by the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing judge, cannot conceiue but angrily and enimie vnto him, and detest the verry scoure of GOD as a curse & damnation. Finally, he can never persuade that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is still minded to punish him. But he only profiteth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to bee angry with his sinnes, but merciful and loving to himselfe. For otherwise that must needs happen, which the Prophet complaineith that he felt, where he faith. Thy wrathes, O God have passed ouer mely terrorrs have oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, because we have fainted in thy wrath: & we have been troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secretes in the light of thy countenance: because all our days are gone away in thy wrath: our yeares are consumed as the worde that is pasted out of a mouth. On the other side David faith thus of his fatherly chastifements, to teach that the faithful are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lord, & hast instruccted in thy law, to give him quiet from euill days, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a hard tentation, when God sparing the unbelieuer and winking at their faultes, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gave them a caufe of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learme, that it is done to provide for their salvation when they are called again into the way, and the wicked are carried headlong into their errors, whose end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be everlastinger or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, & sickness, as the judgement of eternall death are the curses of God: which they are laid vpon men to this end, to be instruments of the Lordes wrath and vengeence against the reprobate.

35 Now (as I thinke) all men doe perceive whereunto tended that chastifement of thy Lord vpon David: even to be an instruction that God is greeuously displeased with manslaughter and adulterie, against which he had shewed so great indignation in his beloved and faithfull servant: that David should be taught to be no more so bolde to do the like deed: and not to be a paine whereby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be judged of other kind of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Davids disobedience whereunto he was fallen in numbring the people. For hee did in deed: freely forgive to David.

Neither that which David suffered after his sinne for gonne nor that which Adad and of his posterity even they whose iniquities are done away do endure to sustaine to the end that God may not be recompensd with paine for sinne.
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

David the guiltiness of his sinne: but because it pertained both to the publike examples of all ages, and also to the humbling of David, that such a hainous offence should not remaine unpunished: therefore he most sharply chastised him with his rod. Which also we ought to have before our eyes in the vniversal course of mankind. For whereas after pardon obtained, we do all yet suffer the miseries that were laide vpon our first parent for paine of sinne: we perceive our felues by such exercises to be admonished, how grievously God is displeased with the transgression of his lawe: that being threwne downe & humbled with knowledge in conscience of our owne miserable estate, we may, the more furentely aspire to true blessednesse. But he shall be most foolishe that shall thinke, that the calamities of this present life are laide vpon vs for the guiltines of sinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chrystoyme when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines vpon vs, that he should call vs, persecuting in euils to repentancc, then when repentance is once shewed, the paine shall be superfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for every mans nature, so he hadleth one man more roughly, and another with more louing tendernes. Therefore where he mindeth to reach that he is not vnmeasurable in taking punishments, he reprocheth to the hard hearted and obstinate people that being striken yet they make not an end of sinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ebrarim was as a cake scorched on the one side, & raw on the other, because the corrections did not pierce into their mindes, that the people having their vices boiled out, might be made meeke to receive pardon. Truely hee that so speaketh, thinke that so soune as a man hath repented, he will by and by become appeasable; and that by our stinnes he is enforced to that rigor in chastising of faults, which should haue bene prevented with willing amendment. Yet forasmuch as we all are of such hainesse and rudenesse, as universally needed chastisement: it seemed good to him beeing a mooste wise Father, to exercisse all without exception with a common scourge all their life long. But it is meruellous why they so cast their eyes vpon the onely example of David, and are not moued with so many examples, in which they might haue beholden free forforguences of sinnes. It is read that the Publicane went out of the Temple justified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his tears wee reade (faith Ambrose) his satisfaction we reade not. And the man sicke of the Palsie hearde it spoken to him: Rise: thy sinnes are forgiven thee. There was no paine layd vpon him. All the abolutions that are rehearsed in the Scripture, are set out as given freely. Out of this great number of examples, a rule should rather haue bene gathered than of that only example that containeth in ita certaine speciall matter.

36 Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counsellleth Nabuchadnezer to redeem his sinnes with righteousnes, and Salomon teaching that charitie hideth a number of sinnes, did not meane that either the one or the other was a satisfactory appeasement of God for sinne. Dan.4.24.

thou hast oppressed the huckle, thou hast spoiled the poor, thou hast hard- lied and vnjustlie handled thy people: for thy vnjust exactions, for thy vio- lence and oppression, now render to them mercy and righteousness. Like- wise Solomon's faith, that with charitie the multitude of finnes is covered: Pro. 10. 12, not before God, but among men themselves. For thus is the whole verse: Hatred raiseth vp contention, but charitie couereth all iniquitie. In which verse, as his manner is, he doth by waie of comparison of contraries, compare the euils that growe of hatreds, with the fruities of charitie: in this meaning, they that hate together, doe one bite, banke at, reproch & raile at an other, and turne all things to the worst, but they that loue together, doe dissemble many things among themselves, do wink at many things, & pardon many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, & helpeth the with admonishing, rather than galleth them with reproaching them. And it is not to be doubted, Peter allegreth this place in the same sense, vnlesse we wil accuse him of depraving & wroghtly wresting the scripture. But whereas he teacheth this sin is purged with mercifulnes & liberalitie, he doth not mean, he recompteth them with made for sin before the face of the Lord, so that God being appeased by such satisfactiō doth release the paine that otherwise he would have laid upon them, but after the accustomed manner of the Scripture hee declareth that they shall finde him mercifull vnto them that leaue their former vices and iniquitie, doe turne to him by godlines & truthe: as if hee shoule faie, that the wrath of God doth cease & his judgement rest, when we cease from our evil doings. Neither doth hee there describe the cause of pardon, but rather the manner of true conversion. As many times the Prophete do declare that Hypocrites doe in vaine pester God with forged ceremonious viages in stead of repentance, whereas it is vprightnes of life with the duties of charitie that delighteth him. As also the author of the Epistle to the Hebreues commending liberalitie & gentlenes, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And wher Chrift, taunting the Pharifecs that giuing heede onely to cleansing of dishes, they neglected the cleanenesse of the heart, commanded them to giue almes that al might be cleane; he did not thereby exhort them to make satisfaction, but only teacheth what manner of cleanenesse pleaseth God. Of which kinde of speach we haue in- treated in another place.

37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sound judge- ment read the parable that the Lord did thereto recite, will make vs any co- trouersie thereupon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not know the woman, which he had so easily receiued into his presence. For he thought that Christ woulde not haue receiued her, if he had known her such a sinner as he was. And thereby he gathered, that Christ was not a Prophet that might in such sort be deceived. The Lorde, to shew that she was no sinner to whom her finnes was alreadie forgiven, did put out this parable. There were two detters to one creditour vpö vfurie; the one ought fifty, the other ought five hundred, both had their debts forgiven the. Whether oweth more thakene? Y Pharisee answered, he to whom most is forgiven. The Lord replied, learne hereby this woman s finnes are forgiven her, because
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive.

The Fathers though speaking somewhat hastily concerning satisfaction, do not withstanding mean any other wise than these new satisfactioners.

Hom. 2. in Pfal. 50.

Defenders of Popish Satisfaction not much helped by the writings of the ancient Fathers.

32 As for those things that are commonly found in the bookes of old writers concerning satisfaction, they little move me. I see indeed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whose bookes remaine, haue either erred in this point, or spoken too crabbedly and hardly: but I will not grante that they were so rude and unskillfull as to haue written those things in that sense that the new Satisfactioners doe reade them.

Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercy is required, examination ceaseth: where mercy is asked, judgement is not rigorous: where mercy is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercy, there is no inquisition. Where is mercy, the sinner is pardoned. Which wordes howsoever they be wrestled, yet they can never be made to agree with the scholasticall doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesial fantastical doctrines, which is fathered upon Augustine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was faide to be given in recompence of sinnes committed, was even in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedfulness in abstaining from sinnes in time to come. I will not alledge that which the same Chrysostome faith, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we should confess our sinnes vnto him with tears: such sentences are manie times found in his writings and others.

Augustine in some places calleth the workes of mercy, remedies to obtaine forgiveness of sinnes: but because no man shoulde stumbe at that little worde, hee himselfe preventeth it in another place. The flesh of Christ (faith hee) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not only these sinnes that are wholly put awaie in baptism, but also these that afterwarde crepe in by weaknesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgive vs our trespasses, and they are forgiven by that singular sacrifice.

39 They haue for the most part called satisfaction, not a recom pense to be rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had bene excommunicate when they would be received againe to the communio, did asceraine the Church of their repentance. For there were joyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings & other things, whereby by they might perwade men that they were truely & heartily wearie of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former do-inges: and so they were saide to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that auncient custome the confessions & satisffactions & are at this daie vse, beoke their beginning. Truely very viperous birthes, by which is brougth to passe, y there remaineth not so much as a shadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I said euen now, I do not deny that peradventure they erred herein. But those things that were besprinkled with a few spots, when they are once handled with these mens vnwashed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we must contend with the authority of olde writers: good God, what old writers do they thrust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched vp his pat-ched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnfaoury dottes of certaine moks that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine and Chrystostome. As about this present question hee taketh in a manner all out of Augustone booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good & bad by some scrapers together. It beareth in deede the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I do not so narrowly examine their follites, let the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that rediousnesse. For to me it shoulde not be verie laboursome, and yet verie plausible to bewray to their great shame those things that they haue herefore hoasted vppon a mysteries, but because my purpose is to teache fruitefully, therefore I passe them ouer.

The v. Chapter.
Of the supplyings vvhich they add to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatorie.

Ovts of this doctrine of satisfactions do owse induinglyes or pardons.
For they say that that which our power wainteth to make satisfactio is supplied by these pardons. And they run so farre forth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merites of Christ and of the Martyres, which the Pope decealeth abroade by his bulles. But although they haue more need of Helleborus to purge their frenetik braine, than argumentes to answere them, so that it is not much woorthie the trauayle to stande vpon confusing such triflinge errors, which are already shaken with many battlerammes, and of themselues grow into decaied age, and bend toward falling: yet because a short confutation of the shalbe profitable for some that be ignorant, I wil nor altogether omit it. As for this that pardons haue so long stande vndr, and haue so long beene punished, having bene vse, with so outrageous and furious licentiousnes: this may serve to teach vs in how darke a night of errors, men in certayn ages past have bene drowned. They saw themselues to be openly and uncolouredly scorned of the Pope and his Bulbeaters, gainfullmarketers to be made

made of the salvation of their soules, the price of salvation to be valued at a false price, & nothing set out to be freely given: that by this colour they be wyped of offerings to be filthy spent upon brothels, bawds & barters, that the greatest blowers abroad of pardons are the greatest deliers of them, that this monster doth daily move more and more with greater licentiousness overunne the world, and grow into outrage, and that there is no ende, new leade daily brought, & new mony gotten. Yet with hie recourse they receyued, they worshipp and bought pardons, and such as among the rest saw somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceits, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit. At the length, since the world suffereth it selfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, & by little and little become frozen, till they viterly vanish away.

2. But forasmuch as manie that see the filthy gaminges, the deceits, theftes, and robberyes, wherewith the pardoners have heretofore mocked & beguiled vs, yet see not the verie fountain of vngodlines from whence they spring: it is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spots. They call the treasure of the church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principal custody of this barne (as I have already touched) they saie to be delivered to the Bishop of Rome, that he should have the distribution of so great gifts, that he might both give them by himselfe, and also grant jurisdiction to other to give them. Hereupon proceed from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred daies: from Bishops, pardons for fourty daies: But they be (as I may naturally describe the) the profaning of the bloud of Christ, Satans mockery: to lead away the christia people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, & to turne them from the true way of salvation. For how could the bloud of Christ be more filthy? profanated, than when it is denied to suffice to the remission of sins, to reconciliation & satisfaction, unlese the want thereof being withered & wasted, should be otherwise supplied & perfused: The law and all the Prophets (faith Peter) beare witness of Christ, that by him forgiveneesse of sin is to be receiued: Pardons giue remission of sinnes by Peter, Paul & the Martyrs. The bloud of Christ (faith John) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons do make the bloud of Martirs the washing away of sinns. Christ (faith Paul) which knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sin, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him: Pardons do sette the satisfaction of sins in the bloud of Martyrs. Paul cryed out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified & died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul & other died for vs. In an other place he faith that Christ purchased the church with his bloud: the pardons appoint an other price of purchase in the bloud of Martyrs. The Apostle faith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for euer them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrarie and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. John faith that all the faintnes washed their gowynes in the bloud of the lambe: the pardons teach men to wash their gowynes in bloud of fainstes.
Leo Bishop of Rome, writeth notablie well to the Palæstinæ against these sacrilegæ. Although (faith he) the death of manie saintes hath beene precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath beene the propitiatiō of the world. The righteous receiued, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithful are grauen examples of patience, not gifts of righteousnesse. For their deceases were every one singular to themselves, and none of them did by his ende pay the debt of an other, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthie to bee remembered) he repeated in another place. There can nothing be required more plaine to destroye this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no leffe fitly to the same effect. Though (faith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the bloud of no Martyrs is shed for the forgivingnesse of sinnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that wee shoulde followe him, but hath giuen vs a thing to rejoyce vpon. Againe in another place, As only the sonne of God was made the sonne of man, to make vs with him the sonnes of God: so he alone for vs hath taken vp his punishment without euil deseruings, & we by him might without good deseruings obteine grace not due vnto vs. Truely whereas all their doctrine is patcht together of horrible sacrilegæ & blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blaspheemie than all the other. Let them remember themselves, whether these be not their decrees: the Martyrs haue by their death done more to God, & deserued more, than was needful for these: & that they had remaining so great a plentiful of deseruings, as did also owre owne vnto other: & that therefore, least so great goodness should be superfluous, their bloud is mingled with the bloud of Christ, & of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission & satisfaction of sinnes. And that so is the saying of Paul to be taken: I supplie in my bodie those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this else but to leave Christ onlie his name, otherwise to make him but a common pettie faint, that may fearely among the multitude bee knowne from the rest? He onlie, onlie shoulde haue bin preached, he onlie for vs, he onlie named, he onlie bene looked vnto, where the obteining of forgivingnesse of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of. But let vs heare their curtained arguments. Least the bloud of the Martyrs should bee shed in vaine, therefore let it be emploied to the commone benefite of the Church. Is it so? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their blood? by defying this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by theirstedfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, & overcome the stubbornnesse of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profit of the Martyrs death, if Christ onlie bee the proprietor, if he onlie died for our sins, if he onlie was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might nevertheless haue obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beddes. And whereas they haue fought euon to the shedding of their bloud, it would not agree with the justice of God to leaue the same barren and fruiteless. As though God could not tell how to encreafe in his servantes their fruite, according to the measure of his gifts. But the Church receivest thereof together profite enough, when it is by their triumphs encouraged to a zealou desire to fight.
Cap. 5 Of the manner how to receive

Saint Pauls words of supplying that which was wanting in Christs sufferings, was dreffed to this purpose.

enclose in lead and parchment the grace of Jesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospel? Truly either the gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the gospel, with all abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merits, with all his righteousness, wisdom & grace, without any exception, Paul witnesses where he faith, that the word of reconciliation was delivered to the ministers, whereby they might use this form of message, as it were Christ giving exhortation by them: we beseech you, yee to reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sin, to be made sin for vs, y we might be made the righteousness of God in him. And the faithfull knowe of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesses) is offered vs to be enjoyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardons do bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine picture of grace, and fasten it to lead parchment, yea & to a certaine place, and sever it from the word of God. If a man should ask, whence this abuse tooke beginning: it semeth to have proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could bear, they which felt themselves about measure oppressed with pence of indulgence they required of the church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the church to God, & said that they were recompenses whereby men may redeem themselves from the judgment of God, then they therewithal did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatory remittances, to deliver vs from deified punishments. As for these blasphemers, that we have refuted, they forg'd them so shamefully, that they can have no colour at all.

6. Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed down, & overthrown from the very foundations. For I do not agree to some men, that think best to dispute in this point, & make no mention at all of purgatory, &c. But contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my self would also think such trifles worthie to be negligently passed over, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatory is builded of many blasphemies, & is daily upheld with new blasphemies, & faileth up many grievous offenses, truly it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might after a sort have bin dissembled for a time, that it was invented by curious and bold rashness without the word of God; that men beleev'd of it by I wot not what revelations, sained by the craft of Satan; that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giueth not leave to mans presumption to so break into the secret places of his judgements, & hath severely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his word, and permitted not his word to be so violeently defiled. But let vs grant, that all those things might for a while have beene borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sinnes is sought else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is given away to any other thing, then it is moste perilous not to speake of it. Therefore wee must cry not only with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throat, & sides, that Pur

Col. 1:24.

4. But howe maliciously doe they wrest that place of Paul where hee faith, that hee supplieth in his body those things that wanted of the suf-feringes of Christ: for he referreth not the default of supplying, to the worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation: but to those affections wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to say, all the faithful must be exercised so long as they shall be in this life. He faith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he daily suffereth in his members the same that he once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsafe to doe vs so great honoure, to reckon and account our affections his owne. Whereas Paul addeth these words, For the Church, he meaneth not for the re-redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and proﬁte of the Church. As in another place hee faith, that hee suffereth all things for the electes sake, that he may obtaine the saluation which is in Christ Iesus. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that Iee suffered all the troubles that he suffered for their comfort and salvation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when hee faith further, that he was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospel of Christ. If they yet require an other exppositor, let them heare Augustine.

The sufferings of Christ (faith hee) are in Christ onely as in the head: & both in Christ and the Church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member faith, I supply in my body that which wanteth in the suf-feringes of Christ. Therefore if thou whatsoever thou bee that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same witt in the sufferings of Christ.
But whereunto the sufferings of the Apostles taken for the Church of Christ doe tende, he expoundeth in another place where hee faith: Christ is to me the gate into you because ye are the sheepe of Christ bought with his blood: acknowledging your price, which is not given of mee, but preached by mee. Then he addeth, As he hath given his soule, so oweth we to give our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and confirme faith. These are Augustines words. But God forbid, that Paul should have thought that an-ye thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnesse of righteousnesse, satisfaction and life: or that he meant to add to any thing thervnto, which so plainly and honorably preacheth, that the abundance of grace was so largely powered out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it onelie all the saints have bene saued, and not by the merite of their owne life or death, as Peter expresslye testiﬁed: so that hee shoulde bee blamorous against God and Christ, that shoulde repose the worthies of any saint anywhere else than in the only mercy of God. But why doe I carrie hereupon any longer, as upon a matter yet doubtfull, ﬁsh the verie bewraying of such monstrous errors is a sufﬁcient confutation of them?

5. Nowe (to passe over suche abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose
enclose in lead and parchment the grace of Jesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospel. Truly, either the gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the gospel, with an abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merits, with all his righteousness, wisdom & grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he faith, that the word of reconciliation was delivered to the ministers, whereby they might se this forme of message, as it were Christ giving exhortation by them: we beseech you, yee so reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sin, to be made sin for vs, y we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. And the faithfull knowe of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offered vs to be enjoyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardons do bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, and fasten it to lead parchment, yea & to a certaine place, and feuer it from the word of God. If a man should ask, whence this abuse tooke beginning; it semeth to have proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could bear, they which felt themselves above measure oppressed with penance, enioyned them, required of the church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the church to God, & said that they were recompences whereby men may redeem themselues from the judgement of God, then they therewithal did also draw these indulgence or pardons to be propitiatory remedies, to deliver vs from deserved punishments. As for these blasphemers that we have receyed, they forgery them so unlawfully, that they can have no colour at all. 8. Now let them no more trouble vs with this purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed down, & overthrown from the very foundations. For I do not agree to some men that think best to dispute in this point, & make no mention at all of Purgatorio, wherupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small establishment is gotten. Truely I myself would also think such trilles worthe to be negligently passed over, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatorio is builded of many blasphemies, & is daily upholden with new blasphemies, & falsity vs many grievous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might after a while have bin dissembled for a time, that it was inguished in curious & bold rashness without the word of God: that men beleived of it. But I was not what realzations, fained by the craft of Sathan; that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giueth not tache to mans presumptuousnes to so breake into the secret places of his judgements, & hath severely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his word, & permitting not his word to be so irreverently defiled. But let vs grant, that all these things might for a while have bene borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sinnes is sought else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore wee must cries out not onl with vehement, but taking of our voice, but also of our throate and sides, that Purgatorio ground being taken away purgatorio therupon builded fallith.

Of the maner how to receive gatorie is the damnable deuise of Sathan, that it maketh voide the Crosse of Christ, that it saith an intolerable slander upon the mercie of God, that it heapeth and overthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that overthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediately overthrowen by the verie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than evident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfactiion, propitiatoric sacrifice, and cleansing for the finnes of the faithful: what remaineth but that purgatorie is a more & horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe over the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to have come out of the same spring of vngodlinesse.

7 But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they have falsly & wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lorde affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost should not bee forgiuen in this world, nor in the world to come be forgiuen, is a slender proofe for purgatorie.

Matthew 12:52.
Mark 3:28.
Lucas 12:10.

That sinne agaist the holie Ghost shal not be forgiuen, is a slender proofe for purgatorie.

Matthew 5:15.

They fetch an argument out of the sayeing of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heaven, earth, & hells, shal bowe to Christ. For they take it as confessed, that hells cannot be forgiuen of those that are aduized to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paines in Purgatorie. They did not reason vniustly, if the

Apostle
Apostle did by kneeling mean the true godly worshipping. But as he teacheth one, that there is a dominion given to Christ, whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what proof is there to the contrary, but that we may by hels understand the Devils, that shall be brought before the judgment of God, to acknowledge him their judge with fear & trembling? Like as Paul himself expoundeth the same prophecy in another place. All (layeth he) shall be brought before the judgment-seat of Christ. For it is written: So truly as I live, every knee shall bow to me, &c. But we may not so expound that which is in the Revelation: I have heard all creatures, both these things that are in heaven, & those that are upon the earth, & these that are under the earth, & those that are in the sea, & all those that are in them, I have heard them all say to him that sitteth on the throne & to the Lamb, Blessing & honor, and glory, & power, for ever & ever. That I do in deed easily grant, but what creatures do they think to be here rehearsed? For it is most certain, that there are contained creatures both without reason and without sense. Wherby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the parts of the world, from the highest top of the heavens, to the very middle point of the earth, do in their manner declare the glory of their creator. As for that which they allege out of the history of the Machabees, I will not yowchafe to answer it, lest I should seeme to recké that workes in the number of the holy books, But Augustine received it for Canonical. But first, of what sure credit did he receive it? The Iews (faith he) seeme not the writing of the Machabees as they do the law, the Prophets & the Psalmes, of which the Lord himself hath wittnesed as of his wittneses, saying: It was necessarie, that all things should be fulfilled that are written in the lawe, and the Psalmes, and Prophets concerning me. But it hath bin received of the Church not unprofitably, if it be soberly read or heard, And Hierome teacheth without any doubting that the authentic thereof is of no force to prouing of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that old book, which is entituled under the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Credde, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I here strue without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craveth pardon, if he have spake any thing not well. Truly he that confesseth his writings neede pardon, saith plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy ghost. Beside that, the godlines of Judas is praised for none other cause, but for that he had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doeth the writer of that historie referre that which Judas did to bee a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithful, that had dyed for their country & religion. This doing was in deed not without superstition & preposterous zeale, but they are more than foole, that drawe a sacrifice of the lawe so farre as unto vs: forasmuch as we know that things do ceaze by the comming of Christ, that then were in use.

9 But they have an invincible bulwark in Paul, which can not so easily be battered. If any man (faith he) build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hey, stubble, the Lord shall shewe every mans worke what what it is: because it shall be revealed in fire, & the fire shall try every man's work, what it is. If any man's work do burn, it shall suffer loss; but he shall be safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of Purgatory? by which the filthinesse of sinne are cleansed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdom of God? But the most part of the old writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the cross, by which the Lord trieth them that he is, that they should not rest in the filthinesse of the flesh: & that is much more probable than in faining purgatory. &c. &c. &c. &c. &c. I do neither agree with these men, because I think I have attained a certain and much plainer understanding of that place. But before that I write it, I would have them answer me, whether the Apostles and all the saints must have gone through this fire of Purgatory? I know they will say, Nay, for it were too much inconvenient that they must have needed to be purged, whose merits they dreamed to overtop above measure to all the members of the church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say, the works of some shall be proved, but the works of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustine, which so confuteth that exposition. And (which is more absurdity) he doth not say, that they shall pass through the fire for all works: but if they have faithfully builded the church, they shall receive reward when their works are examined with fire. First, we see that the Apostle used a Metaphor, when he called the doctrins inuented by men's brains, wood, hey, & stubble: And the Metaphor hath an apparent reason: that as wood so soon as it is put in the fire, consumeth: & wood, hey, & stubble, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that such trial cometh of the Holy Ghost. Therefore to follow the true cause of his metaphor, & match the parts together with just relation, he called the trial of the Holy Ghost fire. For even as the seeret that gold and silver are put to the fire, so much a surer proofe they have of their goodness & finenesse so the Lord's truth, the more exactly it is weyed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiveth. As hey, wood, & stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudden consuming, so the inventions of men not stablished by the word of God, cannot bear the trial of the Holy Ghost, but they by and by fall away & perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, & stubble, because like wood, hey, & stubble, they are burnt with fire & destroyed: but they are not destroyed or driven away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth, the holy ghost is the fire: where with they shall be proved, whose proofe Paul, according to the common use of the scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called, the day of the Lord, whensoever he doeth any way shew his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his truth shineth vpon vs. Nowe haue we proved, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the trial of the holy ghost. But how are they saued by fire, suffer loffe of their work? That shall not be hard to understand, if we consider of what kind of meditation he speketh. For he toucheth those builders of the church, keeping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swerving from the chiefe & necessarie articles of faith, do err in points that be smaller & least perilous, mingling their owne devises with the word of God. Such I fay, must suffer losse of their worke, having their deceiues destroyed. But these elles are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance & error is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy ghost. Therefore, who so ever have defiled the golden fineness of Gods word with this dogn of purgatorie, they must needs suffer losse of their worke.

10. But they will say, it hath beene an ancient vslage of the Church. Paul answered this obiection when he comprehended his owne time in that sentence, where he faith, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the Church, do lay any thing upon the foundation that agreeeth not with it. Therefore when the aduersaries obiect against me, that it hath bin vfed above a thousand & three hundred yeres, to have prayers made for the dead: I ask them again, by what word of God, by what Revelation, by what example it was done. For here they do not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also all the examples of holy men that there are, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning & order of funerals there are sometimes found many & long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to have bene expressly spoken. But the very old fathers themselves that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both comandement of God, & lawful example. Why then durft they so do? In this I say, they did suffer somwhat as men: & therefore I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawn into example. For where as if faithfull ought to enterprise the doing of nothing, but upon assured conscience, as Paul teacheth: this assuredness is principally required in praiers. But it is likely that they were led by some reason into it: they sought some comfort to relieve their sorrow: and it seemed unnatural not to shewe before God some testimony of their love towards the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also if received custome was like a burning brand to set many mens minds on fire. We know that with all nations & in all ages there were funerals done for the dead, & their soules yearely purged. For though Satan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he were occasion so to beguile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but if even very superstition condemeth the Gentiles before the judgement seat of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselves to beleue. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were utterly destroyed. Hereupon came if admired diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproach. And that which first proceded from a wrongful following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encrease, that now it is the principal holinesse of Papistrie, to helpe the dead in distrafe. But the Scripture ministreth another much better & perfect comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in Lord. And it addeth a reason, because from thenceforth they rest from their labors. And we ought not so much tenderly to followe our owne affection of love, as set

A wrongful manner of praying in the church. Truely he hath but meane wife dom, doth some perceive that all that is read here of in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vsage, & the ignorance of the people.
They themselves also, I grant, were caried away into error even as vnadifed lightnes of belief is wont to rob mens wits of judgement. But in the meane time, the verie reading of them doth shew how dountingly they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, report-teth that Monica, his mother did earnestly desire, that she might be remem-bred in celebrating^ ministeries at the Altar. An old writer request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would have it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doutings, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heat of a foolish zeal: if any man desire to be a profitor for dead men, truly with cold likelihodes it will bring them out of care that were before careful. For this is one piller of it, y this doing is not to be despisef, because it is a custome growen in vs, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, that it is a charitable vs to helpe the dead: yet wee must still hold one rule which cannot deceive: that it is not lawful for vs in our prayers to vs any thing of our own, but our requests must be made subject to the word of God, because it is in his wil to appoint what he will have to be asked. Now where as the whole law & the Gospel do not so much as in one syllable give liber-tie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the invocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they have the ancient church companion of their error: I say there is great difference betweene them & it. They vfed a memorial of the dead, lest they should seeme to have cast away all care of them: but they did therewith confess that they doubted of their state. As for purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing uncertain. These men require to have that which they have dreamed of purgatorie, to be holden without question for an article of faith. They slenderly & onely to passe it lightly over, did in the communion of the holy supper commend their dead to God: These do continually call upon the care of the dead, & with importunate praising it, do make it to be preferred above al dutiful works of cha-itie. Yea, & it were not hard for vs to bring forth some testimonies of old writers, that do manifestly overthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were vused. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that al men look for the resurrection of the flesh & the eternal glory, & that every man then reciuethe rest that followeth after death, if he be worthie when he dieth.
And therefore he teacheth, that al the godly do immediately after death enjoy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, & Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you shall our prayers availe them? I passe ouer the groser superstitious, where with they have bewitched the minds of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can have no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthie buyings and sellings that they have vused, while the world was in such grosse fensibl[e ignorance. For both I shoulde never make an ende, end, and also the readers shall without any rehearfall of them, have here sufficient, whereupon they may establish their consciences.

The vi. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian man: And if, by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth us thereto.

WE have alreadie sayd, that the marke wherunto regeneration tendeth is that in the life of the faithful there should appeare an agreement and consent betwixt the righteousnesse of GOD and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are received to be children. But although his lawe containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of GOD is restored in vs, yet because our dulnesse hath neede both of manie prickings forwarde and helps, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of diverse places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that have a desirous minde of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endevour. Now when I take upon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifold & plenteous argument, & such as may with the greatnesse theroft in a long volume, if I would absolutely entreat of it in all points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of old writers, made one by one of several vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For whatsoever vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plente of matter, that a man cannot seeme to haue discouer'd well of it, vnlesse hee haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teache, as peculiarly to goe through every speciall vertue, and wander abroad into exhortations. Let such things be felterched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homelies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shew an orderly trade, wherby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, & shortly to appoint out a certaine vniuerfal rule, by which he may well trie what be his dutties. There shal peraduenture at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leave that to other, which I my selve am not meete to doe. I do naturally love shortnesse, and peraduenture if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with me. And if a longer maner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce have minde to put it in profe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may.

As the Philosopher had their certaine ends of right and honestie, from which they derive particular dutties and all the company of vertues; so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Philosophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were valniglorous men) haue diligently endeavoured to attain an exquisite plainenesse of order, to shewe forth the ready aptnesse of their write. But the Spirite of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime vseth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2. This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly vp to two partes. The first, that there be powred & brought into our minds a loue of righteousness, to which otherwise wee are of natur nothing enclined. The second, that there be a rule set our vnlo to vs, that may not tuther vs to go out of the way in following righteousness. In commendation of righteousness it hath both vere many & verie good reasons: of which we have here before in diuerse places spoken offome, and other some we shal in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better beginne, than when it puteth vs in mind that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straye theepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth vs together again, to ioyn vs in one flocke with himselfe. When wee heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holiness mee must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holiness we come into common with him; (whereas rather we must first cleaue vn to him, that being endued with his holiness, we may follow whither he calleth) but because it greatly pertaineth to his glorie, that he have no fellowship with wickednesse and vn-cleanness. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought alway to have respect vnlo if we wil answe God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawn out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if wee giue our selves leave all our life long to wallow in them stil? Moreover it also admonisheth vs to that the end we may be reckned among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy citie Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himselfe, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholily prophane by the vacleanness of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that they shal have a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to follow righteousness, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, shoulde be like a stable full of filthiness.

3. And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would have vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinketh that the philosophic concerning maneris in them only orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should live agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true wellspring, when it not only teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whome it is bond; but also when he hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true original and state of our creation, thee immediately addeth, that Christ by whome wee came againe into favoure with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should express the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectuall than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lorde hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life shoulde resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if wee doe not not gue and auowe our selues to righteousnes, we doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creator, but also we forswear him to be our savioyr. Then the sripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of God, which the rehearseth vnto vs, and all the parres of our salvation. And sheweth that sith God hath shewed himselfe a father vnto vs, we are worthy to bee condemned of extreme vnthankfulnesse, if we doe not likewise in our behalfe shew our selues children vnto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed vs with the washing of his blood, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptism, it is not seemly that we shoulde be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath graffed vs into his bodie, we must carefully take heede that we sprinkle not any spot or blot vpon us that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our head, is ascended into heaven, it behooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our heart aspire to heauenwarde: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must indevoure that Gods glorie maie be honourable set out by vs, and must not doe anie thing whereby we maie be prophaned with filthines of sinne: Sith both our soule and our bodie are ordained to heavenny incorruption and vnperishing crowne, we must diligently trauel, that the same may be kept pure and vncorrupted vnto the day of the Lord. These (I saie) be the best laide foundations to builde a mans life, and such as the like are not to be found among the Philosophers, which in commendation of vertue doe never clime above the natural dignitie of man.

4. And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that haueing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet woulde bee named Chriftians. But with what face doe they boaste of his holie name: sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue receuied a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Gospell:But the Aposlle faith, that al they have not right-ly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the old man which is corrupted according to the desire of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is proued that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretende the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and round-ly take of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceived as other learnings be, with onelie vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onelie receuied when it possesteth the whole soule, and findeth a seare & place to hold it in the most inward affection of the heart. Therefore either let them ceafe, to the flaunder of God, to boaste of that which they are not, or let them shewe themselves not vnwoorthie scholers for Christ their maister. Wee haue given the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is conteined, because our salvation beginneth at it: but the same must bee powred into our heart, and passe into our manneres, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philosophers doe iustly chafe against them, and doe with shamefull reproch drive them from their companie, that prospeffing an arte that ought to be schoolemaisters of life, doe turne it into a Sophistical babling: with how much better reaon shall wee deteft these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to rule the Gospell vpon the toppe of their tongues, the effectual working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affections of the heart.
Cap. 6. Of the manner how to receive to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortations of Philosophers.

5 Yet do I not require that the manners of a Christian man sauour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which nevertheless both were to be shaped & we must indevoyr vs toward it. But I do not so seuerely require a go-spellike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a Christian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the church, & thare is no man found that is not by a great space distant from it, & manie haue hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet should be vniustly cast away. What then let that be set for the mark before our eyes, to which alone aour endevoyr may be directed. Let that be appointed the goll for vs to run & trauel vnto. For it is not lawfull for thee to make partition with God, to take upon thee part of these things that are commanded thee in his word, & to leave part at thine owne choise. For first of all he eueriwhere commendeth integritie as the chees part of worshipping him: by which worde he meaneth a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour & faining: against which a double heart is set as contrarie: as if it shold be fayd, that the beginning of living vprightly is spiritual, when the inward affection of the mind is without faining dedica to God to obturue holinesse & rightousnesse. But because no man in this earthly prison of the bodie hath so great strength to haft with such frendnes of running, as he perfectly ought to do, & the greater number are so feeble, that with staggering and halting, yea and creeping upon the ground, they auaunce but slowly forward. Let vs euerie one goe according to the mea-Sure of his little power, and proceede on our journey begun. No man shall go so vntowardly, but he shal euerie day get some ground, though it be but little. Theryfore let vs not ceafe to trauel so, that wee may continually pro-cceede somewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not despisoure vpon the flenderness of our going forward, for howsoever the successse answer not our desire, yet we haue not lost our labour when this day paseth yesterday: so that with pure simplicitie we looke vnto our marke, & long toward the end of our course, not soothingly flattering our selues, nor tenderly bearing with our owne euils, but with continuall endeouer trauelling to this, that we may stille become better than our selues, till we attaine to goodnes it selfe: which in deede we seeke for & follow all our life long: but we shal then only attaine it, when being vnclad from the weaknes of the flesh, we shal be received into the ful fellowship thereof.

The vij. Chapter.
The summe of a Christian life: vberiue is instrested of the forsaking of our selues.

Albeit that the law of the Lorde haue a most aptly wel disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it seemed good to the heavenny scholemaster to instruct men yet with a more exact trade to the same rule he had fost forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the dutie of the faithful to yeld there bodies to God a living, holy & acceptable sacrifice vnto him: & that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Hereupon
The grace of Christ.  Lib. 3.

Upon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they do not apply themselves to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may prove what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God; that we should from thence go forth think, speak, imagine, or do nothing but to his glory. For the thing that is consecrate, cannot be applied to unholy uses, without great wrong done ynto him. If we be not our own, but the Lords, it appeareth what errour is to be avoided, and wherunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne therefore let vs not make this the end for vs to tend ynto, to seke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne; therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selves and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods; therefore let vs live and die to him. Wee are Gods: therefore let his wisedome and will governe all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the partes of our life tend toward him as their only lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that having learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from himselfe the rule and governement of himself to give it to God? For as this is the moste strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey themselves: so it is the onely hauen of saetie, rather to know not any thing by himselfe, but only to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first step, that man depart from himselfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not only that which standeth in obedience of the worde, but that whereby the minde of man, void from his own sensualitie of flesh, bendeth itself wholly to the will of Gods Spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) whereas it is the first entrie into life, all the Philosophers were ignorant. For they make only Reason the governesse of man; they think the only ought to be heard: finally to her only they give & assigne the rule of maners. But the Christian Philosphie biddeth her to give place, and to yelde and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man nowe may not live himselfe, but beare Christ liuing and reigning in him.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that wee seke not the things that be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lord, and that make to the aduancement of his glory. This is also a prof of great profiting, that in a manner forgetting our selves, & altogether leaving the regard of our selves, we travel to employ our studie to God & his commandements. For when the scripture biddeth vs to leave priuie regard of our selves, it doth not only race out of our minds y couteousnes of having the greedie seaking for power and fauour of men:but also rooteth our ambition & al desire of worldly glory, and other more secrete pestilences. Truly a Christian man must bee so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this sort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and judgment: so he shall reverently direct ynto him all the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke vpyn God in all things that he hath to doe, is there withall turned away from all vaine thoughts. This is that forslaking of our

G g
Cap. 7. Of the manner how to receive felles, which Christ even fr6 their first beginning of instruction to earnestly gave in charge to his disciples: which when it once hath gotten possession in y heart leauch no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulnesse, nor vaine glorious boating, then neither for course, nor filthie lust, nor riottoufnesse, nor deinteness, nor for other euils that are engendred of the loye of our felues. Contrariwise, wherefoever it reigneth nor, there either most filthie vices do rage without shame, or if there bee any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glory. For the me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he have forsaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lord, will of his owne free will vse goodnesse among men. For al they that have not beene possest with this feeling, if they have followed ver-tue, they have done it at the least for praisifs sake. And all the philosophers that ever most of all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selfes sake, were puffed up with so great pride, that it appeared that they desired ver-tue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proud vp.

But God is so nothing at all delyted, neither with those gapers for the people breath, nor with these swelling beasts, that hee pronounceeth that they have already received their reward in the worlde, and makest harlots and publicanes nether to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not thoroughly declared with how many and how great stoppes man is hindred from that which is right, so long as he hath not forsaken himselfe. For it was truely said in times past, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the sole of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leaving regard of thy selfe, to bende thy minde to seeke those whole thinges that the Lorde requirith of thee, and to seeke them therefore only because they please him.

3 In another place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, goeth through all the partes of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth salvation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that wee shoule deny all vngodliness, and worldly lustes, and that wee shoule liue soberly, righteously and godlyly in this present worlde, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mightie God, and of our Saviour Iesus Christ, which gaue himselfe for vs to redeeme vs from all vnrighteousnesse, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himselfe ferumently given vnto good workes. For after that he hath set forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make readie the way for vs to worship God, hee taketh away two stoppes that doe most hinder vs, that is to say, vngodliness, whereunto wee are naturally too much inclined, & Worldly desires, which extend further. And vnder the name of vnsgodliness, hee not only meneth superstitious, but also compreheneth all that disagreeeth with the ernest feare of God. And worldly lustes are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore hee commandeth vs in respect of both the elves of the lawe, to put off our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life he bringeth in to three partes, sobrietie, righteoufnes, & godliness of the which sobrietie without doubt significeth as wel chastitie and temperance, as a pure & measurable sparing vs of temporall things, and a patient sufferance of pouertie.
Righteousness containeth all the duties of equity, to give every man his owne. The third is Godliness, that seuereth vs from the deslings of the world; and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knihte together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfection. But forasmuch as nothing is more harde, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to give our selves to God and our brethren, and to study for an Angelike life in the filtie state of this earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all shames, calleth vs backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to strive in vaine: because as Christ hath once appeare the redeemer, so at his last coming, hee shall there the fruit of the salvation that he hath purchased. And thus he driueth away the entanglements that blind vs, and make vs not to aspire as we ought to the heavenly glorious yea and he teacheth that wee must travaile as men being from home in this worlde, that the heavenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

4. Now in these words we perceiue, that the forsaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the scripture biddethvs to behave our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that wee faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it gaueth such comendaments as our mind is not able to receiue, but first being made void of natural sence. For (with such blindnesse wee runne all into loue of our selues) every man thinketh himselfe to have a iust cause to advance himselfe, and to despise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God haue given vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely swell, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound, we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringely saine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good gifts, which wee praise in our selues, or better do appeare in other, least we should be compelled to give place to them, we do with our enviousnesse deface them and find fault with them. If there be any faults in them, we are not contented severely and sharply to marke it, but wee also odiously amplify it. Hereupon growth that insolencie, that every one of vs, as though he were priviledged from the common estate, would be higher than the rest, and carelessly and proudly set light by euerie man, or despise them as inferior. The poore yeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, servaunts to their masters, unlearned to be learned: but there is no man that doeth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So every man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his breaste. For presumptuously taking vppon them somewhat whereby to please themselves, they judge upon the wittes and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there bursteth out their poison. For many doe make a shewe of great meekenesse, so long as they finde all things gentle and louely: but howe many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is pricked & stirred to anger? And there is no remedie hereof, but that the most hurtful pestilence of loue, of soueraigne & selfeloue be rooted out of the botomme of their heartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that we must remember that the good gifts that God hath given vs, are not our owne good things, but the free gifts of God, whereof if any be proud, they betray their owne vn-thankfulnesse. Who maketh thee to excel? Paul saith: if thou hast received all things, why dost thou boast as if they were not given thee: Then, that we must with continually reknowledging of our faults, call our selves backe to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proud vpon, but there shalbe much mister to abase our selves. Againe, we are commanded, whatsoeuer gifts of God we see in other men, so to reverence and esteeme those gifts, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it was a great leaudnes for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchsafed to give them. As for their faults, we are taught to wink at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that we should not by reason of those faults triumph against them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man so ever we have to doe, we shall behaue our selves not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendly. As a man shal never come any other way to true meeknesse, but if he have a heart ended with abasing of himselfe, and reu- encing of other.

5 Now how hard is it, for thee to doe thy dutie in seeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, vnlesse thou depart from regard of thy selfe, and in a manner put off thy selfe. For how canst thou performe those things that Paul teacheth to be the woorkes of charitie, vnlesse thou forlike thy selfe, to give thy selfe wholly to other? Charitie (faith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not disdainfull, enuyeth nor, swelleth nor, seeketh nor her owne, is not angrie, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seke not the things that are our owne, we shall doe no small violence to nature, which so beneth vs to the onely love of our selves, that it doth not easilly suffer vs negligently to passe over our selves and our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to an other. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hande, warneth vs that whatsoeuer gratious gifts we obtaine of the Lord, they are committed unto vs vpon this condition, that they should be bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: & that therefore the true vse of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuised for the keeping of the same, than when we be taught that all the good gifts that we have, are things of God delivered, committed to our trust vpon this condition, that they shoulde be disposed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans bodie are endued. No member hath his power for him selfe, nor applyeth it to his private vse: but poureth it abroade into the other members of the same body, and taketh no profit thereof, but such as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatsoeuer a godly man is able to doe, hee ought to be able to do it for his brethren, in providing none otherwise pri- vately for himselfe, but so that his mind be bent to the common edification of of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindness & doing good: that whatsoever God hath bestowed upon vs, whereby wee may help our neighbour, we are the Bailifes thereof, and bound to render account of the disposing of it. And that the only right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of love. So shall it come to passe, that wee shall alway not only joyn the travel for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that wee should not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the gifts that we receive of God, he hath in the old time set the same lawe even in the smallest gifts of his liberalitie. For he commanded the first fruits of corn to be offered unto him, by which the people might testifie that it was unlawful for them to take any fruite of the goods that were not first consecrate to him. If the gifts of God be so only then sanctified unto vs, when we have with our own hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is evident that it is an vtrue abuse thereof that doth not favour of such dedication. But it shall bee vaine for thee to go about to enrich the Lorde with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore fith thy liberalitie cannot extende vnto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must vse it toward his saints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may nowe be correspodent to these of the law.

6 But that we should not be wearie with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adiowned which the Apostle speaketh of, that charitie is patient and not moued to anger. The Lord commandeth to doe good to all vniuersally, of whome a great part are most vnworthie, if they be considered by their own deserving. But here the scripture helpeth with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we must not have respect what men done or of thy selfe, but that the image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honor and loue. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the homofide of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed & restored by the spirit of Christ. Therefore whatsoever man thou light vpon, that needeth thy help, thou hast no caufe to withdrawe thy selfe from doing him good. If thou say that Esay.5.7. hee is a stranger: but the Lorde hath given him a marke, that ought to bee familiar vnto thee, by the reason that hee forbidd thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that hee is base and naught worth: but the Lorde sheweth him to be such a one, to whom hee hath vouchsafed to give the beautie of his image. If thou say that thou owest him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whom, thou knowest so many and so great benefices wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou say that hee is vnworthie that thou shouldest laboure any thing at all for his sake, but the image of God whereby he is commended to thee, to worthie that thou shouldest give thy selfe and all that thou hast vnto it. But if he have not onely delivered no good at thy hand, but also pronounced thee with wrongs and euill doings: euin this is no just cause why thou shouldest cease both to love him and to doe for him the dutifull worke of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise delivered of me. But what hath the Lorde delivered? Which when he commanded Cap. 7 Of the maner how to receive thee to forgive all wherein he hath offended thee, truly he wilth the same to be imputed to himself. Truely this is that only way to come to that which is utterly against the nature of man, much more is it harde for man. I mean, to love them that hate vs, to recompense euil with doing good, to render blessings for reproches: if wee remember that wee must not consider the malice of men, but look upon the image of God in them, which des-facing and blotting out their faults, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to imbrace it.

7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when wee performe the dutie of charitie. But it is not hee that performeth them, that only doth all the dutifull works of charitie, although hee leave none of them undone, but he that dooth them of a sincere affection of love. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to al men all that he ow-theth, so much as concern eth outward dutie: and yet he may bee farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that would seeme very liberall, which yet doe give nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnesse of wordes they vpbraideth it. And wee bee come to such wretchednesse in this unhappie wrold, that almost no almes are giuen of anie men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproching. Which peueritie shoulde not haue bene tolerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somwhat more required than to hewe a cherefulnes in countenance, and make their doings lovely with gentleenesse of wordes. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whome they see to neede their helpes, and then to pity their caues, as if themselves did feele and suffer it: so that they may be carried with feeling of mercie & gentleenesse, even as they would be to help themselves. He that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, wil not onely not defile his doings with any arrogancie or vpbraiding, but also neither wil despite his brother to whom he doeth good, as one needing his help, nor tread him vnder foote as one bound vnto him: no more than we vse to reproche a sick member, for cawing wherof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it specially bound to the other members, because it hath drawnen more help vnto it than it hath recompened. For it is thought that the common interpartning of dutie between members of one bodie, hath no free kinde of gift, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the lawe of nature it were monstrous to deny. And by this reason it shall followe, that hee may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of dutie, as it is commonly vsed, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, hee leaueth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather every man shal thinke thus with himselfe, that he is altogether debtor to his neighbours, and that hee must determine none other ende of ving his liberalitie, but when abilitie failleth, which howe large suctuer it be, must bee measured by the rule of charitie.

8 Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall parte of forsaking our selues, which wee saide so have respect to God. Wee have saide much of it alreadie, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall bee sufficient to entreate of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and suffe-
The grace of Christ.

First therefore in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hercunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lord's will, we should yeld vs to the affections of our heart to bee named and subdued. To couet wealth & honors, to compasse authority, to heap vp riches, to gather together all such follies as ferue for royallie and pompe, our lust is outrageous, & our greedinesse infinite. On the other side of povertie, ignobilitie, & basse estate, we have a maruellous feare & maruellous hatred, that move vs to travaile by all means to eschew them. Hereby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they have, how many shifles they attempt, with what studies they wearie their life, that frame their life after their owne desire; to attaine those things that their affections of ambition or courtesousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape povertie and base-nesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such shames. First, let them not either desire, or hope for, or think vpon any other meanes of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselves vpon it. For howsoever the shame thinketh it selfe sufficient of herselfe, when she either travaileth by her owne diligence, or endeavoureth with her owne studie, or is helpen by the fauour of men, to the attaining of honour & wealth; yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, & that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or travaile, but in so much as the Lord shall prosper both. But on the other side his only blessing findeth a way through all strops, to make all things proceede with vs to a joyful full and luckie end. Then howsoever we may most of all observe any glory or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heaps of great honors & riches) yet for as much as they vpon whom resteth the curse, do feel no parcel of felicitie, we can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to evil. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

Therefore if we beleue that all the meanes of prosperous successfull & such as is to be wished, consisteth in the only blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamities must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that we do not greedily endeavour to wealth and honors fluishing vpon our owne finenesse of wit or diligence, not leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that we alway looke vnto the Lord, to be led by his guiding to whatsoever lot he hath provideth. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and inuading of honours, by wrong, by guile and cruel crastic meanes, or extorition with doing inuertiue to our neighbours, but shal only follow those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of God's blessing among fraudes, extorntions, and other turme meanes of wickednesse? For as God's blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doeth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes and corrupt doings. Then wee shalbe bridled that wee burne not with vnmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man trust to be helpen of God, to obtaine those things that hee desirith against his word? For God forbid that God shoulde giue the helpe of his
Of the manner how to receive blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not according to our wish & hope, yet we shalbe restrained from impatience, and from cursing our estate whatsoever it be: because we knowe that that is to murrur against God, at whose will riches and pouertie, balenese and honours are disposed. Briefely, he that teareth himselfe in such sorte as is foresaid upon the blessing of God, neither will be act full fuctilities hunt for those things that men are wont outragiously to count, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endevour or to fortune, but will affigne it to God the author. But if while other mens estates do flourish, he go but slenderly forward, yea or slide backwarde, yet he will beare his ill fortune with greater quietness and moderation of minde, than a prophan man will beare a meanly good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired: because he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than upon the highest top of wealth and authoritie: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is available for his saluation. So wee see that David was minded, and yeeldeth himselfe to bee ruled by God, hee declareth himselfe to bee like to a weaned childe, and that hee walketh not in high things or maruellous aboue himselfe.

The quiet contentment of minde which growseth amongst men in the manifolde casual miseries of this life, if they bee once assured not that fortune death bringeth care, but God providently dispose their whole estate.

And the godly minde ought to haue that quietness and sufferrance not onlye confiting in this behalfe: but also it must extend to all chancies whereunto our present life is subject. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath so resigned himself vp wholly to the Lord, that he suffereth all the partes of his life to bee governed by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoever happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with envioushess against God complaine of his fortune. Howe necessarie this affection is, shal hereby appeare, if you consider to howe many chancies we bee subject: Diuerse kindes of diseases do trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime we are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile devouring the hope of the yeare, bringeth barrenness, that drieth vs to deaeth: sometime our house, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these be the things at chancing whereof men curst their life, dесеst the day of their birth, haue heauen & light in execution, murmur against god, & (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vnjustice & crueltie: But a faithfull man must even in these chancies beholde the merciful kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore ceasse to praise god; but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leave it desolate. Or if when his corn is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten downe with haile, hee see famine at hande, yet hee will not despare, nor speake houefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, Wee are yet in the Lords protection, and heepe brought vp in his pastures: hee therefore will finde vs foodie euene in extremest barrenness. Or if hee be troubled with sicknesse, euene then hee will not bee discouraged with bitternesse of sorowe.

to burst out into impatience and quarrel thus with God: but considering the righteousness and lenity in God's correction, he will call himself back to patience. Finally whatsoever shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, he will take it with a well pleased and thankfull minde, least he should stubbornly refift his authoritie, into whose power he hath yielded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the heathen be farre from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their minde against adversities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because he was blinde and vnadvised, that blindly wounded both the deferving and undeserving. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlincsse, that the only hand of God is the judge and governesse of both fortunes, & that it runneth not forward with vnadvised sodaine rage, but with most orderly justice dealeth among vs both good things and euy.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the bearing of the crosse, which is a part of the forsaking of our selves.

BVe a godly mind must yet clime vp higher, euë to that wherunto Christ calleth his discipiles, that every one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lorde hath chosen and vouchsafed to receive into his company, must prepare themselfes to a harde, travailesome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diverse kindes of incommodities. So it is the will of the heavenly father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may haue a true proofe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceeded with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloved sonne above the rest, and in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and daintily handeled: so that it may be truly said, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing els but a kind of continuell crosse. The Apostile sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoved that he should learne obedience by those things that he sufcred. Why the should we privinglese our selves from that estat, wherunto it behoved Christ our head to be subject, specially sth he became subject thereunto for our cause, to shew vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostile sayeth that this is the appointed end of all the children of God to be fashioned like vnsto him. Whereupon also in hard & sharp chaunces, which are reckoned adversities and euyls, ariseth a great comfort vnsto vs, that we communicate with the sufferings of Christ, that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heavenly glory, so we maye by diverse tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so faith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we do also conceive the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like vnsto death, we are so prepared to the fellowship of his glorious rising againe. Howe much may this auaile to affwage all the painefulnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with adversities, so much the more sure is our fellowship with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferinges are.
Cap. 8. Of the manner how to receive are not only made blessed vnto vs, but also do much helpe vs to the furthernce of our saluation.

2 Beside that, our Lord had no need to take upon him to beare the crosse, but to testifye & prove his obedience to his father: but we for divers cava-tes haue neede to lead our life vnder a continuall crosse. First (as we be natturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh) vnlesse our weaknesses be shewed vs as it were before our eyes, we doe easily esteeme our owne strength ab-oue due measure, & doubts not that whatsoever happes, it will continue, vnbroken & vncouerly against all hard assaults. Whereby we are caried into a foolish and vain confidence of flesh, and then triuall thereupon, we stubbornly waxe proude against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beare down, than when he proueth vnto vs by experience, not onely how seeble, but also how fraile we be. Therefore he affliceth vs either with shame, or poverty, or losse of children, or sickness, or other calamities, which we being vnable to beare in respect of our selues, do by and by sinke downe vnder them. Being so humbled we leaue to call vpon his strength, which only maketh vs to stand vpright vnder the heavy burden of afflicctions. Yea the most holy, how well soever they know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancy, vnlesse by the trial of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselves. The stout fulnes crept into David: I faile in my heart, I shall never be moved, Lorde, thou hadst established in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was striken. For he confessed that with sluggishe heart in prosperitie his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, vpon which he shoulde have hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetual continuance. If this chaunced to so great a Prophet, which of vs ought not to be fearful, that we may be heedful? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancy and patience, when they are once humbled with adueritie, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocritse. The faithfull(lay) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, do therby profit to humility, y being vncloued of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may refert to the grace of God.

And where they are once come to his grace, they feel the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred pati-cence, by patience profess. For whereas God hath promised the faithful that he wil be present with them in troubles, they feele the same to be true, what they stand patiently being uphelden by his had, which by their owne strengt they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a preffe by experience to the holy ones, that God when need requiriteth, will indeede performe the helpe that he hath promised. And therby also their hope is confirmed; for as much as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience proued to be constant and sure. We see now how many good things do come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse. For, overthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume

The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 230

presume of our owne strength, & disclosing our hypocrisy delighteth vs, it shake away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God only, by which it cometh to passe, that wee neit-ther be oppressed nor fall down. And after victory foloweth hope, insomuch as the Lord in performing which he hath promised, stablitheth the credit of his truth for time to come. Truelie, although there were no moe reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercize of the crosse is necessary for vs. For it is a matter of no small importance, to have the blinde love of thy selfe wiped away, that thou maist well knowe thine owne weakenes. To fende thine owne weakenesse, that thou maist learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou maist remoue thy confidence from thy selfe unto God, to rest with confidence of heart vpon God, that being vpholden by his helpe, thou maist continue vnovercome to the last ende: to stand fast by his grace, that thou maist understande that he is true in his promises: to knowe by proved the truth of his promises, that thy hope maie bee strengthened thereby,

4. The Lord hath also another end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and mistrust vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience to ward him, other than the same that hee giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approved by witnesses, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open view the strength of sufferance & constancie, where with he hath furnished his seruaunts, it is faide that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempred Abraham, & had proved of his godliness, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his owne & onles sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proved in troubles, as gold is tried in a furnace.
And whom can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithful man hath receiued of his God, should be brought forth into vse, that it may be made certainly knowne & manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himself doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stir vp the vertues that hee hath giuen to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable & perishe; then is there a good reason of the affictions of the holy ones, without which their patience should be nothing. I say also by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne wish, but after the will of God. Truely if all things should flow vnto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an olde Proverb, when they exhorted any man to suffer adversities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only ma truly entred under the yoke of God, when he yeelded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Nowe if it bee most righteous, that wee should chewe ourselves in all things obedient to the heavenly father, then we ought not to refuse, that he should by all meanes accustome us, to yeeld obedience unto him.

5 But yet we perceiue not how necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we doe also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God,

God, so soone as it hath been but a little while deintly and tenderly handele. The same happeneth unto it, that chaunceth to stubborn horses, which if they bee a fewe daies pampered idlyly, they cannot afterwarde for fearness bee tamed, neither doe knowe the rider, to whose government they somwhat before obedied. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to have bene in the people of Israel, that beeinge well fed and covered with fatness, we kicke against him that fed & nourished vs. The liberality of god should indeede have allure vs to consider and loue his goodnesse, but forasmuch as our evil nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender visage, it is more than necessarie for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we run not outrageously into such a stubborn wantonness. So that we should not grow fierce with vnmeasurable abundance of riches, that we should not文娱e proud being lifted vp with honors, that wee should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune, the Lord himselfe, as he forseeth it to be expedient, preventeth it, & with the remedy of the crose subdued & bridled the fearness of our flesh, & that divers waies, so much as is healthful for every man. For all are not alike sick of all one diseases, or do alike neede of hardening. And therupon is to be scene how some are exercised with one kinde of crose, and some with another. But whereas the heavenly Philisian handleth some more gently, and purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneath to provide for the health of all: yet he leaueth none free or untouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

6 Moreover, the most mercifull father needeth not only to prevent our weakness, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forspackled life ought by and by to enter into our minds: so without doute we shall finde that we have done somewhat worthy of chastisment. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our expectation to patience upon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministrith vs a far better consideration, when it saith, the Lord correcteth vs with adversitie, that wee should not be damned with this world. Therefore we ought euer in the very sharpnes of tribulation to acknowledge the kindness & goodnes of our father toward vs, forasmuch as even then he ceaseth not to further our salvation. For he doth affliet, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliver vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shall lead vs to that, which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My son, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be weary when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loueth, he correcteth, & embraceth him as a father doth his child. Whence we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our dutie rather to shewe our selves obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardned with quill doings; The Lorde leefeth vs, vnlefe hee call vs backe by correction when we are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes rightly faith that we are bastards, and not children if wee bee out of correction. Therefore wee are most srowarde, if wee cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that he hath for our salvation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene the the vnbeltieuer and the faithfull, that the vnbeltieuers as the bondslaves of a rooted & hardened wickednes, are made the worse & more obdurate with whipping:the faithfull, like children having an honest freedome of nature, do therby profit to repentance. Now must thou chooe of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in an other place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an ende.

7 Moreover it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousness. For then we ought to think, how great an honor God vouchfaeth to grant vs, that he so garnifheth vs with the peculiar mark of his souldiers. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousness, not only that suffer for defence of the Gospel, but also that are troubled for any defence of righteousnesse. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Satan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocentes against the wrongs of the wicked, we be driven to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the world, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in danger: let it not be grievous or loathsome vs to employ our selves for God, or let vs not thinke our selves miserable in those things in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Poverty indeede, if it be considered in it self, is miserable:likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame. Finally, death is the uttermost of all calamities. But when the favour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicity. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimony of Christ, then with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall rejoice as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selves cleere in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyle of our goods: we are in deede brought to poverty thereby among men, but so riches doe truly grow vnto vs in heaven before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly received into the houishold of God. If we be vexed & despised, we take so much the deeper roots in Christ, if we be noted with reproches & shame, we are in somuch the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If wee be flaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs bee ashamed to esteeme lesse these things, vpon which the Lorde hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticinge pleasures of present life.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defence of righteousnesse, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly & cheerfully receive them at the Lords hand, specially fith this is the kind of croffe, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth, But it is more grievous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheith that we shall not only suffer persecutions, but also reproches because we trueth in the living God. As in another place hee teacheth vs after his example to walke through slander and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheerfulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitterness and sorrow, or else the patience of the holy ones in the cross were no patience, unless they should be both tormented with sorrow and vexed with grief. If there were no hardnes in poverty, no pain in sickness, no grief in shame, no horror in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to beare the indifferently? But when every one of these doth with the natural bitterness thereof bite the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithful man sheweth itself, if being afflicted with the feeling of such bitterness, how grievously for ever he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting, he overcommeth it, his patience verteth it selfe herein, if being sharply provoked, he is yet so bridled with the feare of God, that he bursteth out not into any distemper. His cheerefulness appeareth herein, if being wounded with sadness & sorrow, he resteth upon the spiritual comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithfull do sustaine against the natural feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience & temperance, Paul hath very well described in these words: We are put to distresses in all things, but we are not made sorrowful; we labour, but we are not left destitute; we suffer perfections, but we are not forsaken in it; we are thrown downe, but we perish not. You see how to beare the crosse patiently, is not to be altogether astonished, & without all feeling of sorrow: as the Stoics in old time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such one, as putting of all nature of mists, was alike moved in prosperity and in adversitie, in sorrowfull and joyful full state, yea such a one as like a stone was moved with nothing; and what have they profited with this high wisdom? Forsooth they have painted out such an image of wisdom as never was found, & never can hereafter be among men: But rather while they couetted to have too exact & precise a patience, they have taken away all the use of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among christians there are new Stoics, that reckon it a fault not only to grope and weep, but also to be sad & carefull. But these strange conclusions do commonly proceed from idle men, which buying themselves rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but breed vs such new foolish doctrines. But we have nothing to do with that folly Philosophie, which our master and Lord hath condemned not only by his word but alio by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens adversities. The world (faith he) shall reioyce, but you shall mourne and weep. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no maruell, For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we judge of the Lorde himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody tears? If every sife be noted of infidelity, what shall we judge of that quaking fear, with which we read that he was not seldome striken. If all sadness be misliked, how shall we like this, that hee confeseth his soule to be sad even to the death.

10 This I though good to speake to this end, to call godly minds from despair, that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not put off the natural affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a senseless dulnes, and of a valiant & constant man, a stock. For the Scripture gieth to the holy ones the praise of patience, which they are so troubled with hardnes of adversities, that that yet they be not overcome nor thrown down with it: when they be so pricked with bitterness, that they be also delighted with spiritual joy: when they be so distressed with grief, that yet they receive courage again being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the mean time that repugnance abideth still in their hearts; that natural sense efecheth and dreads those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godliness travaileth even through all those difficulties to the obeying of God's will. This repugnance the Lord expressed when he saide thus to Peter: When thou wast young thou didst gird thy selfe and didst walk whither thou wouldst: But when thou art old, another shall gird thee and lead thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn unwillingly and resisting unto it. Else his martyrdom shoulde haue but small praise. But howsoever he did with great cheerfulnes of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being stricken with horror thereof, he would gladly have escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called unto it by the commandement of God, then conquering & treading downe fear, he gladly, yea and cheerfully tooke it upon him. This therefore we must in due order, we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reverence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinance all contrarie affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoever kinde of crosse we be vexed, even in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For adversities shall haue their sharpenes, wherewith wee shall be bitten: so when we are afflicted with sickness, we shall both grone and be disquieted & desire health: so being pressed with poverty, wee shall be pricked with the stinges of carefulnesse and sorrows: so that wee be stricken with griefe of shame, contempt and injury: so shall we yeilde due teares to nature at the burial of our friends: but this alway shalbe the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his will. Yea even in the middest of the prickings of sorrow, in the middest of mourning and teares this thought must needs come between, to encline our heart to take cheerfully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moved.

11 But forasmuch as we have taken the chief cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in fewewordes define what difference is betweene Philosophical and Christian patience. Truely very few of the Philosophers climped to so high a reason, to understand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, & to thinke y God is in this behalf to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that we must yelde vs to God, because we shall travaile in vaine to wrestle against him? For if wee obey God, only because we so must of necessity, the if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first justice and equity, then the care of our salvation. These therefore bee the Christian exhortations to patience: whether whether povertie, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sickenesse, or losse of parentes, or children, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these thinges doth happen, but by the will and providence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most iust order: For why? do not our innumerable & daily offices deserving to be chastised more sharplie:and with more grievous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God laieth vpon vs? Is it not most great equity, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that shee doth not wantonly growe wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and truth of God worthy, that wee shoulde take paine for it? But if there appeare an undoubted righteousnesse in our afflictions, we cannot without vnrighteousnes either murmure or wrestle against it. We heare not now that colde songe: We must giue place, because we so much of necessity, but we heare a huely lesson & ful of effectuallnes, We must obey, because it is vnlawful to resist: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnes against the righteousnesse of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthy to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our safety & benefite, the good father doth this waie also comfort vs, wher he affirmeth that euin in this that he afflicted vs with the croffe, he prouideth for our safety. But if it be certain that troubles be wholesome for vs, why should we not receive them with a thankful and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we do not forceably yeld to necessity, but quietly agree to our own benefite. These thoughts (I say) do make that how much our minds are grieued in the croffe with natural feeling of bitterness, so much they bee cheared with spirituall gladnes. Wherupon also followeth thanksgiving, which cannot be without joye. But if the praise of the Lorde and thanksgiving proceedeth of nothing but of a chereful and joyful heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praising of God and thanksgiving in vs: hereby appeareth how necessary it is that the bitterness of the croffe be tempered with spirituall joye.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

But with whatsoever kinde of trouble we bee distrest, wee must alwaie looke to this ende, to see our selves to the contempt of this present life, and thereby bee stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because GOD knoweth well howe muche we bee by nature inclined to the beastly lue of this world, he veth a most fitte meane to drawe vs backe, and to shake of our sluggisshnesse, that we shoule not sticke too fast in that lue. There is none of vs that defireth not to seeeme to aspire and endeavour all their life longe to heavenlie immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excel bruite beastes in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferiour to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doings of euerie man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon growtheth that senselesnesse, that our minde becyyng daeled with vayne glistering of riches, power and

and honors, is so dulled that it cannot see farre. Our heart also being possessed with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weighed down, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with inticements of the flesh seeketh her felicite in earth. Therefore to remedy this cuill, doth with continual examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore that they should not promise themselves in this life a soule & quiet peace, hee suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vp rores, or robberies, or other injuries. That they should not with too much greediness, gape for fraile and transtoriue riches, or rest in the riches that they alreadie possess, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrenness of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to povertrie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefits of Mariage, he either maketh the to be vexed with the frowardnes of their wives, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these things he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glory, or immeasurably rejoyce with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases & dangers set before their eies, howe vnstable, and vanishing be all the goods that are subject to mortalitie. Then only therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the croffe when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnaquiet, troublesome and innumerable waies miserable, and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckned the good things thereof are uncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with many euis mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be sought or hoped for but striving: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heaven. For thus we must beleue. That our minde is never truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnles it have first conceived a contempt of this present life.

2. For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile in our sight, or holde vs bounde with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we have any care of eternitie, we must diligently indevour to loose our sulies from these setters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasuantesse, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much housefull for vs to be nowe and then called away, that we bee not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done if we did here enjoy a continuall concourse of good things and felicite, where we cannot with continuall spurres of euis be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not only the learned doe know, but also the common people have no Proverbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing verie profitable to be knowne, they have set it out with manie notable sentences. But there is nothing that we doe either more negligently consider, or leffe remember. For we goe about all things as though we would frame to our sulies an immortallitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall, or if wee walke among graves, then, because there is an image of death before our eies, I graunt we do maruellously.
Cap. 9. Of the manner how to receive

lously we discourse like Philosophers upon the vanity of this life. Albeit we do not continually, for many times all these things do nothing more. But where it happeneth our Philosophy lasteth but a while, which so soon as we turne our backs, vanisheth away, and leave no steppe at all of remembrance behind it: finally, it passeth away as clapping of hands upon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also we subject to death, as though we had never heard any report thereof, fall to a careless assuredness of earthly immortality. If any man in the mean time tells us of the Proverb, that man is a creature of a dates continuance, we grant it indeed: but so heedlessly, that still the thought of everlastsing continuance refresheth in our mind, who therefore can deny, that it is a great profite to vs all, not onely to be admonished in words, but by all the examples of experience that may be, to be convinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as when we are convinced, we fearfully cease to stand amazed with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the uttermost end of good things. But if it be necessary that God instruct us, it is our dutie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth & awaketh our duienesse, that despising the world we may with all our hearts endeavore to the meditation of the life to come.

But let the faithfull accustome themselves to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnhankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the most slender blessings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefite of God in it, we are guiltie of no small vnhankfulness toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithfull a testimonie of God's good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their salvation. For before that he openly deliver vnto vs the inheritance of eternal glory, his will is to shew himself a Father vnto vs by smaller examples: & these be the benefits y are daily bestowed vpone vs. Sith therefore this life serueth vs to understand the goodness of God, shall we disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodness in it? We must therefore put on this feeling & affection, to reckon it among the gifts of goodness y are not to be refused. For though there witt testimoines of scripture, of which there are both many most euidet, very nature it self doth exhort vs to give thanks to the Lord, for ye he hath brought vs into the light of it, ye he grauit vs the use of it, ye he giueth vs all necessarie succours for the preservation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine manner prepared to the glorie of the heavenly kingdom. For so the Lorde hath ordained that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heaven, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they shoulde not triumph, till they had overcome the hard adventures of the battell, and obtained the victorie. Then another reason is, that wee doe by divers benefites beginne therein to taste the sweetenesse of Gods liberalitie, that our hope & desire shoulde be whetted too long for the revealing thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we live this earthly life, for which as we be bounde vnto him, so we ought to be mindful and thankfule: then we shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate estate thereof, to this end that we may be delivered from too much greediness of it, whereas unto as I have before saide, we are of our selues naturally inclined.

4. Nowe whatsoever is taken from the wrongful desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I grant indeed that they thought truely, that thought it better not to bee borne, and the next, to die quickly. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, fee therein but unhappie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friendes, and solemnly rejoiced at their burials, but they did without profite, because being without the right doctrine of faith, they did not fee how that may turne to good to the godlie, which is of itself neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their judgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in judging of mortall life, that when they understand it to be of itself nothing but miserie, they may refort wholly the more refreshly and readilie to the eternall life to come. When we come to this comparison, then this present life may not onlie be safely neglected, but also utterly despised and loathed in comparison of the other. For if heaven be our countre, what is the earth els but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an entring into life, what is the world but a grave? to abide in it, what is it else but to bee drowned in death? If to be delivered from the body is to bee set in perfect libertie, what is the body else but a prison? if to enjoy the presence of God is the highest sum of felicite, is it not miserable to lack it? But til we be escaped out of the world, we wade abrede fro the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heavenly life, doth it ought to be despised & troden vnder foot. But it is neuer to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subjection to sin, & yet that hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must be so moued either with wearines or hatred of it, that desiring the ende of it, wee maie be also ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, so that our wearinesse may be farre from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, where in the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to kepe till he call vs away. Paulindeed lamenteth his state that he is holden bound in the bonds of the body longer than he wished, & signeth with fervent desire of his redemption: neuertheless to obey the commandement of the Lorde, he profession himselfe ready to both, because he acknowledgeth himselfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glorie. Therefore if we must live and die to the Lorde, let vs leave to his will the time of our life and death, but so that wee bee still fervent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despise this life in comparison of the immortalite to come, and with to forfake it when it shall please the Lorde because of the bondage of sinne.

5. But this is monstrous, that in stead of that desire of death, manie that boast themselves to bee Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at euery mention of it, as of a thing betokening unluckily and unhappie.

Cap. 9. Of the manner how to receive

Truly it is no marvell, if natural sense in vs doe quake for feare when we heare of the dissouling of vs. But this is in no wise tollerable, that there be not in a Christian mans brest the light of godlinesse, that should with greater comfort overcome and supresse that feare, howe great soever it bee. For if we consider that this viu feald, faultie, corruptible, frail, withering, and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore dissouled, that it may afterward be restored againe into a viu feald, perfect, vn corruptible and heauenlie glory: that not faith compel vs severely to desire that which nature feareth. If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabite our countrie, as a heauenly countrie, shall we obtaine no comfort thereby? But there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I grant, and therefore I affirm, that wee ought to looke vnto the immortalitie to come, where wee maie attaine a viu feald state that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth verie well teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cheerfully to death: not because they would be vnclad, but because they desire to be newlie claded. Shall brute beasts, yea and feeble creatures, even stocks and stones, knowing their present vanity, bee earnestly bent to looking for the laft day of the resurrection, that they may with the childre of God be deliuered from vanitie, and shall wee that are endued with the light of wit, and aboue wit enlightened with the spirit of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our minds beyond this rottennes of earth? But it pertaineth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake against this peruerfinesse. And in the beginning I have already professed, that I would not here take vpon me the large handeling of common places. I would counsell such as fearfull minde to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, vnlesse they were meet to bee sent to the Philosophers, that they may begin to be ashamed when they see the contempt of death that those do shew. But this let vs holde for certainly determined, that no man hath well professed in Christ his schoole, but hee that doth joyfully looke for the day both of death and of the laft resurrection. For both Paul doth describeth all the faithfull by this marke, and also it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will get forth a ground of perfect gladnesse. Rejoyce (faith the Lorde) and lift vp your heads, for your redemption commethNeere at hand. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of so great force to raise vp joy and cheerefulness in vs, should breede nothing but sorrow & discouragement? If it be so, why doe we still boast of him as of our Schoolemaister? Let vs therefore get a sounde minde, and howsoever the blinde and senselesse desire of the flesh do strive against it, let vs not doubt to wish for the comming of the Lord, not onlie with withing, but also with groaning & sighing, as a thing most happy of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to vs, to draw vs out of the infinite gulfe of euils and miseries, & to leade vs into that bleesed inheritance of his life and glory.

This is certainly true: all the nation of the faithful, solong as they dwell in earth, must be as sheep appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnlesse they had their mind raised vp into heauen, & surmounted all yis in the world, & passed over the present face of things. Contrariwise whay they have

haue once lifted their heads above all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying quiet peace, if they see the proud in gourgeousnes & sumptuousnes of all things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delights, besides that if they be spoiled by their wickednes, if they sustaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their covetousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they wil easie vpold thofe theues in such aduersties. For that day halbe before their cies, the Lord shall receive his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdom, when he hal wipe al tears from their cies, when he hal cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladnes, when he shall feed them with vynspeakeable sweetnes of his deinties, when he shall advance them to the fellowship of his high estate:finally when he shall vouchsafe to interparten his felicite with them. But these wicked ones that haue flourished in the earth, he shall throw into extreme shame, he shall change their delights into tormentes, their laughing and mirth into weeping & gnashing of teeth, he shall disquiet their peace with terrible torment of conscience, he shall punish their deintinesse with vnquenchable fire, & shall put their heads in subjection to those godlie men, whose patience they haue abused. For this is righteousnes (as Paul testifieth) to give release to the miserable & to them that are vnjustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that do afflict the godlie, when the Lord Iesus halbe revealed from heauen. This trulie is our onlie comfort, which if it be take awaye, we must of necessitie either despair, or flatteringly delight our selues with the vain comforts of the world to our own destruction. For euon the Prophet cöffeth that his feet staggered, when he traved too long upon considering the present prosperitie of the wicked; & that he could not otherwise stand fast, but when he entred into the sanctarie of God, & bended his cies to the last end of the godlie & of wicked. To conclude in one word then onlie the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the hearts of the faithful vpon the Diuell, flesh, sinne, and the wicked, when our cies are turned to the power of the resurrection.

How we ought to use this present life, and the helps thereof.

By such intertroductions the Scripture doth also well informe vs what is the right use of earthly benefits: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if wee must use wee must also use the necessitie helps of life: neither can we eschew euon those things that seeme rather to serve for delight than for necessitie. Therefore we must keepe a measure, we may use the with a pure conscience, either for necessitie or for delight. That measure the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certain road through a strange countrey, by which they trauell toward the kingdom of heauen. If we must but passe through the earth, doubtlesse we ought to farre to use the good things of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our journey. Therefore Paul doth not vnprouitably counsell vs to use this world, as though wee vised it not, and to buy possessions with such a minde as they use to bee fould. But because this place is slipperie, and so slope on both sides,

that it quickly makest vs to fal, let vs labour to fasten our foot there, where we may stand safely. For terme haue beene some, that otherwise were good and holy men, which when they sawe intemperance and riot continuallie to range with vnbridled lust, vnlesse it be sharply restrained, & were desirous to correct so great a mischief, they could find none other way, but suffered man to use the benefittes of the earth, to farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were too seuerie. For (which is a verie perillous thing) they did put streeter bonds vpon consciences, than those wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they expound necessitie, to all staine from all things which a man may be without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarcely take any more food than bread and water. And some be yet more seuerie, as it is read of Crates the Thebaine, that did throw his goodes into the sea, because if they were not destroied, hee thought that he should be destroied by the. Many at this day, while they seek a pretence whereby the intemperance of the flesh in vs of outward things may be excusd, and while they go about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnesse, doe take that as a thing confessed, which I doe not grant them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitation of measure, but that it is to be left to every mans conscience to vs as much as hee eth to be lawfull for him. Truelie I conffesse that consciences neyther ought nor can in this point bee bounde by certaine, and precise formes of lawes. But forasmuch as the Scripture teacheth general rules of lawful vs, we must surely measure the vs according to these rules.

2. Let this bee a principle: that the vs of Gods giftes sweareth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the author himselfe hath created and appointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than he that shall diligentlie looke vnto this ende. Nowe if wee consider to what ende hee hath created meates, we shall find that he meant to make provision not onelie for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparril, beside necessitie hee appoynted another end, which is comeliness and honestie. In heerbes, trees, and frutes, beside diverse profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetenesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefittes of God that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that oyle maketh his face to shine, the Scripture would not enforcethere, to set forth his liberalitie, rehearse that hee hath giuen all such things to men. And the verie natural qualities of thinges doe sufficiently shewe, to what ende and howe farre we maie use them. Shall the Lorde have set in flourcs to create a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eies: shall hee haue giuen to create a sweetenesse of fauour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it be vnlawfull either for our eyes to take the vs of that beautie, or for our smelling to feele that sweetnes of fauour? What: Hath hee not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more accepteable than other? What: Hath hee not giuen to golde and siluer, to iuytie and marble, a special grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalles or stones? Finally, hath hee not made many things commendable dable unto vs without necessarie vse?

3. Therfore away with that unnaturall Philosophie, which in graunting of the creatures no vse but of necessity, not only doth niggardly bereave vs of the lawful vse of Gods liberaltie, but also can not take place vnlesse it first have spoiled man of all his senses & made him a block. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence provide a stay for the lust of the flesh, which if it be not brought into order, our oweth with measure: and it hath (as I haue said) defended of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie do grant unto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this end, that we should know the author of them, and give him thankes for his tender kindnesse toward vs. Where is thy thankes giving, if thou so gluttonously fille thy selfe with deainty meates or with wine, that thou eyther bee made senflesse, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by too great abundance boyling in filthic luft, doth with her vnclenaes infect thy mind, that thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest! In apparell, where is thankfulness to God, with costly gorgeousnesse thereof we both in admiration of our felues and disdain other? If with the trimmisse and cleanliness of it, we prepare our selves to vncharitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixt vpon the gaines of our apparell? For many so giue all their senses to bodily delights, that the minde lieth overwhelmed. Many are so delighted with marble, gold & paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into metalles, & be like vnto painted images. The smell of the kitchen, or sweetnesse of savour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be scene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licenciousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, & that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lusts therof, to which if we grant too much, they boile out above measure and temper.

4. But there is no surer nor readier waie than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heauenly immortallitie. For therupon follow tow rules: the one, that they which vs this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that mary wiuers, as though they did not mary: they that buy as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. Hee that biddeth thee to vs this world as though thou diest not, doth cut away not only the interperance of glutony in meat & drinke, & too much deainty, sumptuousnesse, pride, hautinesse, and nicenesse, in fare, building, & apparell, but also all care and affection that may either withdrawe thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heauenly life, or from studie to garnieth thy soule. But this was long agoe truely said of Cato: that there is great carelesnesse of trunming our body, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an olde proverbe, that they which are much busied in care of their body are commonly carelesse of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truely it must be

Rom. 13. 14. The light estima tion of this present life, and the earnest meditation of immortality cutteth of the o mer great care which men haue of outward things.
1. Cor. 7. 3.
Cap. 10. Of the manner how to receive subject to this law, to beare verie little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call upon themselves with continuallie bent minde, to cut of all thewe of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excesses, & to take diligent heed, that they do not of helpe make to them selues hinderances.

5 The other rule shalbe, that they that haue but small and slender riches, maie learene to lacke painelessly, that they be not carelessly mov'd with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that kepe, haue not a little profited in the Lords scholoe: as he that hath not at least somwhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to prove himself the scholer of Christs. For beside this that the most part of other vices do accompany desire of the earthly things, he that beareth poverty impatiently, doeth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which will be ashamed of a poore coat, wilbe proud of a costly coat: he that will not be content with a hungrie supper, will be distiughted with desire of a deintier, & woulde also intemperately abuse those deinties if he had them: he that hardly & vnquiedy beareth a private and base effate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that have an untauned zeale of godlinesse, endeavour to leare by the Apostles example, to be ful and hungrie, to haue store, and suffer want.

The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the use of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the precepts of charity. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifulnesse of God, & appointed for our commodity, that they maye as thinges delivered vs to kepe, whereof we must one daie yelde an account. We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying maie continually be found in our cares, yelde an account of thy bailiwick. Therefore let this also come in our mind. Who it is that asketh such an account, euene he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobriety, honest sparing, & modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnesse, pride, ostentation, & vanity, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is joined with charity, which hath already with his owne mouth condemned all those delightfull things that do withdraw a mans mind from chastity & cleanenesse, or do dul his wit with darkness.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth every one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is caried hither and thither, howe greedie his ambition is to holde diverse things at once. Therefore that all thinges shoulde not be confounded with our folly and rashnesse, he hath appointed to euerie man his duties in seuerall kindes of life. And that no man rashly runne beyond his bonds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therefore euerie mans seueral kind of life is vsed to him as it was his standing appointed him by GOD, that they should not all their life uncertainly wander about. And this diuision is so necessarie, that all our doings are measured therby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the judgement of mans reason & Philosophie. There is no deede accounted more noble, euene among the Philosophers, than for for a man to deliuer his countrey from tyrannie: but by the voice of Gods judgement the private man is openly condemned that layeth hand vpon a tyrant. But I will not carrie vpon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we knowe that the calling of the Lord is in every thing the beginning & foundation of well doing: to which he that doeth not direct himselfe, shall never keepe a right way in his doings. He may peraduenture sometime doe somewhat seeminge worthie of praife: but whatsoever that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shalbe rejected: moreover there shalbe no convenient agreement in the partes of his life. Therefore our life that then bee best framed, when it shalbe directed to this mark: For then, no man caried with his owne rashnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his bounds. He that shalbe a man of base estate, shal contentedly live a private life, lest he should forfake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Again this shalbe no small reliefe to cares, labours, griefes, and other burdenes, when a man shal knowe that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the houholder will binde himselfe to his duties: every man in his kinde of life will beare and passe through the discommodities, cares, tediousnesse, and anguishes thereof: when they are perswaded that every mans burden is laide vpon him by God. Hereupon also shall grow singular comfort, for as much as there shalbe no worke so filthy and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xii. Chapter. Of the justification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I think I have alreadie sufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recover saluation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefits of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what fruities it bringeth forth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is gien vs by the goodnesse of God, and conceiued and possesse of vs by faith, by partaking of whom wee receive principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, wee may nowe in stead of a judge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the seconde, that being sanctified by his Spirite, wee may give our selves to innocencie and purenesse of life. As for regeneration, which is the seconde grace, wee haue alreadie spoken of it as much as seemed to bee sufficient. The maner of justification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to understande both howe the Faith by which alone wee receive freely gien righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good works: and also what be the good workes of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entrecathe. Therefore they are first to bee thoroughly discusset, and so discusset that we must remember that this is the chiefest state of upholding religion, that we may be the more careful and heedfull about it. For vnsesse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his judgement is of.
Cap. 11. Of the manner how to receive is of thee: as thou hast no ground to establish thy salvation, so hast thou also none to raise thy reverent fear toward God. But necessity of this knowledge shall better appeare by knowledge itself.

2. But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should doe if we should enter disputiation of a thing unknouen) let vs first declare what is meant by these speeches, Man to be justified before God, To be justified by faith or by works. He is said to be justified afore God, that is pronounced by the judgement of God both just and accepted for his owne righteousness sake. For as wickedness is abominable before God, so a sinner cannot finde favour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore whereas ouer sinne is, therfore appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is justified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a just man, & by reason thereof he standeth fast before the judgement seat of God when all sinnes fall. As if an innocent be brought to be arraigned before the seat of a righteous judge, when judgement is giuen according to his innocencie, hee is faide to bee justified before the judge; so he is justified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witness and affirmer of his righteousness. Therefore after the same manner a man shalbe said to be justified by works, in whose life there is found such cleaneesse and holinesse, as may deterre the testimony of righteousnes before the throne of God; or he that with the uprightnesse of his works is able to answer and satisfie Gods judgement. Contrariwise he shallbe faide to be justified by faith that being excluded from the righteousness of works, doth by faith take hold of the righteousness of Christ: wherwith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight of God, nor as a sinner, but as righteous. So wee simply expound justification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into favour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiveness of sinnes, and imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

3. For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it cannot be denied, that this is the proper & most vited signification of the worde. But because it is too long to gather all the places & compare them together, it shalbe enough to put the readers in minde of them, for they may of themselues easly marke them. But I will bring forth some, where this justification that weespeake of is expressly entreated of by name. First, where Luke saith that God which in Christ did justify God. And where Christ pronounceth that wisedome is justified by her children: hee doeth not meane therein, that they doe give righteousness, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of salvation righteous, which hath euuer that of it selue. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to give to God & his doctrine the praise that they deserve. Againe when Christ reproocheth the Pharises, that they justify themselues, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteousness by wel doing, but doe vaingloriously secke for the fame of righteousness, where-as in deed they bee voyde. They that are skilfull of the Hebreue tongue doe better understande the sense of this phrase: in which tongue they are not not only called wicked doers, that are guilty in their conscience of any wicked doing: but also they that come in danger of judgment of condemnation. For when Berthabe faith that Saul and Solomon shall bee wicked doers, hee doth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that hee and her sonne shall be put to shame; to bee numbered among the reprobate and condemned. But by the process of the text it easily appeareth, that the same word in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signify any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that we are now in hande with: where Paul faith, that the scripture did foresee, that God justifieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man understand thereby, but that God doeth impute righteousness by faith? Again, when hee faith that God justifieth the wicked man, that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefite of faith to deliver them from the damnation which their wickednesse defuered? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when hee cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that justifieth, who shall condemn? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if hee should say, Who shall accuse them whom God acquiteth? who shall condemn them whose patron Chrit is and defendeth them? To justifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from guiltiness as allowing his innocencie Sith therefore God doth justify vs by the intercession of Christ, hee doth acquite vs, not by allowance of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousness, that wee may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selves. So in the 13. Chapter of the Acts, in Pauls sermon: by him is forgivennesse of finnes preached vnto you, and euery one that beleueth in him is justified from all those things, from which you could not be justified in the lawe of Moses. You see that after forgivennesse of finnes, justification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for absolution, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the lawe, you see that it is the meere beneficiall gift of Christ; you see that it is received by faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where hee faith that wee are justified from finnes by Christ, So when it is said that the Publicane came justified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousness by any deferuing of works. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his finnes obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. Hee was therefore righteous, not by approouing of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose saith very well, that calleth the confession of finnes a lawfull justification.

4 But to leave scruiuing about the wordes: If we looke vpon the thing itself, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truly Paul doth expresse justification by the name of acceptance, when he faith (Ephes. 1:5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christe, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious favoure, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in favoure. For the same is meant by it that is said in another place, that God doth freely justify. In the 4. Chapter to the Romances, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousness, and sticketh not
not to say that it consisteth in forgivinge of sinnes. That man (said he) is called of David a blessed man, to whom God accounteth him righteous without works, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truely he there doeth entreat not of one part of justification, but of all justification wholly. And he testifieth that David in that place maketh a definition of justification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is given free forgiveness of sinnes. Whereby appeareth this righteousness wherein he speaketh, is in comparison simply let as contrary to guiltines. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth, that this is the summe of the message of the Gospel, that wee should be reconciled to God; because it is his will to receiue vs into fauour through Christ, in not imputing sinnes vnto vs. Let the readers diligently w e a l l the whole processe of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to expresse the manner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing els by the word reconciling but justifying. And that which he saith in another place, that wee are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, unless we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our selues.

2. Cor. 5. 18.

Rom. 5. 19.

Osanders opinion concerning justification.

5. But where as Osander hath brought in, I wote not what monister of essential righteousness, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousness, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereauneth them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is worthy the labour to confute this doting error. First this speculation is but of mere & hungry curiosity. Hee doeth in deede heap together many testimonies of Scripture, to prove that Christ is one with vs, & we one with him, which needeth no proofe: but because he keeppeth not this bond of virtue, he shaneth himself. But wee which hold thee are made all one with Christ by the power of his Spirit, may easilie vnloose all his knots. He had conceived a certain thing very near to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to convey the substanse of God into men. Hereupon riseth an other inuention of his that Adam was fashioned after the image of God, because even before the fall Christ was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I wil carry upon the matter, I haue presently in hand. He faith that we are one with Christ. We grant. But wee denye that the substanse of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreover we say that this principle, that Christ is righteousnesse to vs, because he is an eternal God, the fountain of righteousnesse and the very selue righteousnesse of God, is wrongfully drawn to defend his deceits. The readers shal pardon me, if I do now but touch these things that the order of teaching requireth to be differed into another place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing els by the name of essential righteousness, but to resist this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christes sake: yet Ie plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousnesse: it is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but faineth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitie poured into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that that not onely Christ, but also the Father & the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs, Which although I grant to be true, yet I say that hee wrongfully wretche them. For he should have considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the father & the holy Ghost are in Christ, & as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwellth in him, so doe we possesse whole God in him. Therefore all that hee faith seperally of the father & the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other ende but to draw the simple from Christ. And then hee wretche in a mixture of substantes, whereby God pouwing himselfse into vs, doth make vs as it were a parte of himself. For hee wretche it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we growe into one with Christ, & y hee is our head & we his members, vnlesse his verie substance be mingled with vs. But in the father & the holy ghost (as I haue said) he doeth more openly bewray what he thinketh, even this, that wee bee justifie not by the onely grace of the Mediator, & that righteounes is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteounes of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

6 If hee did say no more, but that Christ in justifying vs, is by essentia conteynynge made ours: and that not only he is our head; in that he is man, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is poured into vs: He shoule with lesse hurt feede himselfse deintilly, & peraduenture so great a contention should not have beene raised for this doting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blachte and thicke bloud hideth her many tacles, we must needs earnestlie resift vnlesse we will wittingly & willingly suffere that righteounes to be taken from vs, which onely bringeth vs confidence to glorie of salvacion. For in all this discourse, the name of righteounes, & this worde justifying, extend to two partes: that to be justifie is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to bee made righteous, that righteounes is not a free imputation but a holinesse and uprightness, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then hee stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteounes in respect beinge a priest hee did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appeaue his father towarde vs, but in respect that hee is eteniall God and life. To prove that first point, that God doeth justifie not onely by forgiving but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doeth leave them whom he doth justifie such as they were by nature, changing nothing of their vices.

The answerere hereof is verie easie: that as Christ cannot bee torn in partes, so these two things which we together and joyntly receive in him, that is to say righteounes and sanctification, are insepardable. Therefore, whomsoever God receiueth into favour, hee doeth also therewithall give them the spirite of adoption, by the power whereof hee newly fashioneth them after his image. But if the brightness of the sunne cannot be seuered from the heat thereof, shall wee therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heat? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, the Sunne with his heat giveth life & fruitfulnesse to the earth, with his beams he giveth light and brightness. Here is a mutuall and inseparable continent, ye reason forbiddeth to conuye to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this

of the confusion of two forces of graces, that of finding them to the observing of righteousness, whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore of finding confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptance, and affirmeth that they be all one & the selfsame thing. But the Scripture joining them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifold grace of God may the better appeare unto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that Christ was given unto righteousness and sanctification. And whereas he reasoneth to prove by the salutation purchased for vs by the fatherly love of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holiness & cleanliness, he plainly declareth, that it is one thing to be justified, and another to be made new creatures. But when commeth the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he can appliceth. Where Paul faith that faith is accounted for righteousness to him that worketh not, but he continueth in him that justifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashness, he deprauieth all the fourth Chapter to the Romans, & sinketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I even nowe alleged, Who shall accuse the elects of God? it is God that justifieth: where it is plain, that he speaketh simply of guiltiness and acquitting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth upon that comparing of contraries. Therefore is found too fond a babbler, as well in that reason as in alleging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he speak of the name of righteousness, in saying that faith was accounted to Abraham for righteousness, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteousness of God and God himself) he excelled in singular virtues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteousness that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling, but rather to the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the virtues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had increased them; yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he received by faith the grace offered in the promise. Whereupon followeth, that in justification there is no place for works, as verie well affirmeth.

As for this that is objecteth, that the power of justifying is not in faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receieth Christ, I willingly grant it. For if faith did justifie of it selfe, or by inwarde force, as they call it, and as it is always feeble and unperfect, it could not worke justification but in part, so should the justification be maimed, that should give vs but a piece of saluation. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking do say that God onely justifieth: and then we give the name to Christ, because he was given unto righteousness: and faith we compare as it were to a vessel. For except we came empty with open mouth of our soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receive Christ. Whereupon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of justifying, when wee teach that he is first receiued by faith, before that his righteousness bee receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when hee sayeth that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because... gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not unlike, but that faith although it be by it selfe of no worthinesse or price, may justify us in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that faith, which is only the instrument to receive righteousness, is vnfitly mingled with Christ which is the materiall cause and both author and minister of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolved. How this word faith ought to be understood when we entertain of justification.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the inwarde worde is receiued by the ministration of the outward word, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthooде of Christ and the person of the Mediattour to his outward Godhead. As for vs, wee diuide not Christ, but wee say that he is the same eternal worde of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousness: and wee confesse that other wise hee could not have fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchased vs righteousness, vnlesse he had beene eternal God. But this is Osanders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that hee was made righteousness to vs, in respect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhood. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it shall not bee peculiar to Christ, but common with the Father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousness of the one, and another of the other. Moreover, that which was naturally from eternity, could not be conveniently sayde to bee made to vs. But although we grant this, that God was made righteousness for vs, how shall it agree that that which is set between, is made of God?
Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator, which though he containeth in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet there he is specially si-nified by his proper title, by which he is feuerally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But hee foolishly triumpheth in that one worde of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lorde Iehoua shall bee our righteoufnesse, but out of that hee shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnesse, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In an other place we have rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that GOD purchased co himselfe the Church with his bloud, if any man gather thereupon, that the bloud wherewith finnes were purged was divine, and of the nature of godhead, who can abide so foule an error? But Osander thinketh that with this so childish a cauillation he hath gotten all things, he swelleth, hee leaferth for ioy, and stufferth many leaves full with his bigge words : when yet there is a plain and readie solution for it in sayinge that the worde Iehoua in deede when he is made the issue of David shall be the righteousness of the godly: But Esai teacheth in what sense, sayinge: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Let vs note that the father speakeyth: that he giueth to the sonne the office of justifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setreth the manner or meanes as they call it in the doctrine whereby Christis known. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this worde, Daab knowledge passiuely. Hereupon I gather first, that Christ was made righteousness when hee did put on the forme of a seruant: secondly, that hee did iustifie vs in respect that hee shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore hee doth not this for vs according to his

his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed unto him. For although God alone is the fountain of righteousness, and we be made righteous by no other means but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by unhappie disagreement estranged from his righteousness we must needs come downe to this lower remedie, that Christ may justifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

9 If he obiect that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is above the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I graunt: but in the seconde I saye that hee is unwisely deceived. For although Christ could not cleanse our soules with his bloud, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from guiltinesse, nor do the office of a priest, vnlesse he had beene true God, because the strength of the flesh had beene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certayne that hee performed all these things according to his nature of manhood. For if it bee demanded how wee be justified, Paul answerseth, by the obedience of Christ. But did hee any otherwise obey than by taking upon him the shape of a feruant? whereupon wee gather that righteousness was given vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other wordes (which I maruaile that of stander is not ashamed to allege so often) he appointeth the fountaine of righteousness no where else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe no sinnne hee made sinnne for vs, that wee might be the righteousness of God in him. Of stander with full mouth aduaunceth the righteousness of GOD, and triumpheth as though hee had proved that it is his imaginative ghost of essentiaIl righteousness: when the wordes founde farre otherwise, that wee bee righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young Beginners should not haue bee ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in John, where the glorie of God is compared with the glorie of men. I knowe that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof GOD is the author and which God giueth vs: but though I say nothing, the readers that haue their sound wit do perceive that nothing els is meant in this place but that wee stande vpright before the judgement seat of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christs death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Of stander do agree with vs in this point that we are justified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propiciatory sacrifice for vs, which can not agree with his nature of Godhead. After which force, when Christe meaneth to scale the righteousness and salvation that he hath brought vs, hee first of all an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. Hee doeth in deed call himselfe the liuely bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verifie meate, and his bloud is verily drinke. Which maner of teaching is seene in the sacraments, which although they directe our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousness and salvation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that hee is onely man, hee either justifieth or quickeneth of himselfe, but because it pleased GOD to shewe openly in the mediator that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountain set open for vs, out of which

Hovv Christ doth justifi as man, & howv as God.

we may drawe that which otherwse shoulde without fruite lie hidden in that close and deep spring y riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the mediatour. In this manner and meaning, I do not denie that Christ as he is God and man doth justifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the Father and the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousness whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, is the eternal righteousness of the eternall God, so that he yeld to the sure and plaine reasons that I have alleged.

10 Nowe that he should not with his caullations deceiue the vnskilfull. I graunt that we want this incomparable benefite, till Christ bee made ours. Therefore we set that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hearts, and that myticallyall vnion, in the highest degree: that Christ being made ours, may vse vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not beholde him a farre off out of our selves, that righteousness may be imputed vnto vs, but because we haue put on him, & are graffed into his body: finally because he hath vouchfaed to make vs one with him, therefore we glory that we haue a fellowship of righteousness with him. So is Ofsanderesflanderous caulation confuted, where hee faith that we count faith righteousness, as though wee spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith empty to him, to giue roume to his grace, that he only may fill vs. But Ofsander refusing this spiritual conioyning, enforseth a groffe mingling with the faithfull, and therefore hee odiously calleth all them Zwinglians that subscribe not to his fantasticall errour, concerning essentiall righteousness: because they doe not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lords supper. As for me, I count it a great glory to bee so reproched of a proud man and gien to his owne errours. Albeit he touched not me only, but also other writers well knowe to the world, whom he ought to haue modestly reverence. It mouueth mee nothing, which meddle not with mine owne private cause: and so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Where as therefore he so importunately requireth essentiaall righteousness, and the essentiaall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this ende. First that God shoulde with a groffe mixture poure himselfe into vs, as he faineth a fleshly eating of Christ in the supper: Secondly that God should breath his righteousness into vs, whereby wee may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteousness is as well God himselfe, as the goodness or holiness, or pureness of God. I will not spend much labour in wiping away the testimonies that hee bringeth, which hee wrongfully wreteth from the heauenly life to this present state. Through Christ (faith Peter) are giuen vs the precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were nowe such as the Gospel promiseth that we shal be at the last comming of Christ: yea a John telleth vs, that wee shall then see God as he is, because we shalbe like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a small taste to the readers, that I do of purpose passe out of these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous work.

11 But in the second point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth he are righteous together with God. I think I have already sufficiently proued, that
Cap. xi. Of the maner how to receiue

That although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and fruiteleffe, and of itself so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthily to be vsuauorlie to sounde and godly Readers. But this is an untolerable wickelesse, vnder pretence of double righteousness, to enseeble the earnest assurance of saluation, and to carie vs aboue the cloudes, that wee shoulde not embrace by faith the grace of propitiation, & call vpon God with quiet minde. Osiander scorneth them, that teach that this worde juftifiyng is a lawe terme : because, wee must be righteous in deed. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be juftified by free imputation. But, if God do not juftifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meane that faying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himeselfe, not imputing to men their sines? For, him that had done no sines, hee made sines for vs, that he might be the righteousness of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they bee juudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner how is declared, for that God juftifieth by forgiving as in another place juftification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of them as contraries, doeth clearly shewe that it is a phrase borrowed from the use of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanly practised in the Hebrew tongue, if hee have a sober brain, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Nowe where Paul faith that David described the righteousness without workes, in these worde, Blessed are those whose sines are foruicuen : Let Osiander anfwere mee whether this be a full definition or but half a one. Truely Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witnefe, as though hee taught that for-guicueneffe of sines is but a parte of righteousness, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the juftifying of man. But he includeth whole righteousness in free foruicueneffe, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sines are couered, to whom God hath foruicuen iniquities, and to whom hee imputeth no transgresions. He doth meafeure and judge such a mans feliciteit thereby, because he is not this way righteous in deed, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and faith, that this should be slaunderous to God, & contrarie to his nature, if hee shoulde juftifie them that in deed remaine still wicked. But wee must remember, as I have alreadie saide, that the grace of juftifying is not feuered fro regenration although they be feuerall things. But because it is more than insufficiently known by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remants of sines, it must needes bee that they be farre otherwise juftifiyed than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation, God so beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by litle and litle, & sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seat in danger of the judgement of death. But he juftifieth the not by partmee, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenesse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteousness could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because wee be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of juftification is misturned, yea, overturned from the very foundation, when dou-ting is cast into mens minde, when the assiance of saluation is shaken, wheth

the free and dreadful intonation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillity with spiritual joy is not stablished. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contrary, to prove, that the inheritance is not by the law. For by this mean faith should be made voyde, which if it have respect to works, is overthrown, because none of the most holy shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of justifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two fortes of righteousness) is very well expressed by Paul: for (speaking of his real righteousness in deed, or of the vprightneffe wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousness) hee lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am, who shall deliver mee from the body of this death? But flying to the righteousness which is grounded upon the onely mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth over both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all adversities. Who shall accuse the electes of God whome he justifieth? For I am surely persuaded, that nothing shall seuer vs from his love in Christ. Hee plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousness which alone fully sufficeth to saluation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a little before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glory. This divereffie is sufficiently knowne, & so familiar to all the holy ones, that groane vnder the burden of iniquities, & yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp above al feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagree:th with the nature of God, it fall eth vpon himselfe. For although hee cloatheth the holy ones with a double righteousness as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse ye without forgивeness of sinnes they never pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him grant, that they which are not righteous in deed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But howe farre shall a sinner extende this free acceptance that is put in place of righteousness? shall he measure it by the pound or by y ounce? Truly he shal hang doutfull and dVVering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousness as shalbe necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happie that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not judge of this cause. But this shall stand stedfast, that thou maist be justifie in thy sayinges and overcomne when thou art judged. But howe great pre- sumption is it to condemne the chiefe judge when he freely acquiteth, that this answere may not bee in force, I will have mercie vpon whom I will have mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this sayinge, tended not to this ende that he should spare none, but that hee should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offence. And wee do say that they which were loth have their sinnes buried and so are justifie before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he can loue none but them whom he justifieth. But this is a marvellous maner of justifying, that they being couered with the righteousness of Christ stand not in feare of the judgement which they haue deferred, & when they worthily condemne themselves are accounted righteous without themselves.

But the readers are to bee warned, that they take good heed to the mystery mysterie which he braggeth that he wil not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely travailed to proove that we do not obtaine favour with God by the onely imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ, because this should bee impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous; (I vfe his owne words) at length he conclude that Christ was given vs vnto righteousnesse, not in respect of his nature of manhood but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousnesse cannot be founde but in the person of the Mediator, yet it is the righteousnesse not of man but of God, he doeth now binde vp his rope made of two righteousnesses, but he plainly taketh away the office of justifying from Christes nature of manhood. But it is good to see howe he disagreeth. It is saide in the same place, that Christ was made vnto vs wisedome,which belongeth to none but to the eternal worde. Therefore Christ in that hee is man is not wisedome. I answere that the onely begotten sonne of God was in deed his eternal wisedome, but in Pauls writings that name is giuen him in diuerse wise, because all the treasures of wisedome & knowledge are laide vp in him. That therefore which hee had with his father, he discloseth vs: and so that which Paul saith is not referred vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our wee, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhood: because although hee shined a light in darkenesse, before that hee did put on fleshe, yet it was a hidden light till the same Christ came forth in his nature of man, the shining funne of righteousnesse, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the worlde. Also it is foolishly objected of him, that the power of justifying is farre above both Angels and men: forasmuch as this hangeth not vpon the worthisse of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to satisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subiect to the law, to redeem vs frō the curse of the lawe. Also he doeth flauderously cauie, that they which deny that Christ is our righteousnesse according to his nature of Godhead, doe leaue but one part of Christ, & (which is worse) doe make two gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they say againe that we are not righteous by the righteousnes of God. For although wee call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we do not by & by take away ye honour frō whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in the fleshe, but we only make a distinc: how the righteousnes of God is conuied vnto vs, that we may enjoy it. In which point of sauer hath too fowly erred. Neither doe we denye that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, proceedeth from the secret grace & power of God; and we streue not against this, that the righteousnes which Christ giueth vs is the righteousnesse of God that proceedeth from God: but we holde this stedfastly, that we haue righteousnesse & life in the death & resurrection of Christ. I ouerpaue that heaping together of places whereof he may well bee ashamed, wherewith he hath sediously combred the readers without choise & without common reason, to proove that wherefoever is made mention of righteousnes, there ought to be understood this essentiaall righteousnesse. As where David calleth vpon the righteousnes of God to helpe him; whereas he doth in summe about an hundred times, yet did not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other objection, that is properly and rightly called righteousness, whereby we bee mooved to doe rightly, but that God onely worketh in vs both to will and to performe. For we do also not deny, but that God reformeth vs with his spirit unto bolithness of life and righteousness: but we must first see whether he doeth this by himselfe & immediately, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left all the fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the needes of his members. Moreover, although righteousness come vs out of the secret fountain of the godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousness vs according to his nature of godhead. No less fond is that which he faith, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousness of God. Because unlesse the will of his father had moved him, he could not himselfe have satisfied the office committed vs to him. For though we have in another place saide, that all the sufferings of Christ himselfe do proceed from the mere good will of God, yet that makest nothing to that fantastical thing, where with ofander bewitcheth both his owne & simple mens eyes. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountain & beginning of our righteousness, therefore we be essentially righteous, & the essence of Gods righteousness dwellth in vs? In redeeming the church (faith Esay) God did put on his righteousness as a harnesse: but did he so to speyle Christ of his armor which he had giuen him, to make him to bee no perfecte redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other words, saying, that hee gaue vs salvation to the shewing of his righteousness. But this doeth not overthrow that which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whoseoeuer wrappest vp a double righteousness, that poore soules may not rest in the meere onely mercie of God, hee doeth in a mockerie crowneth Christ with thornes.

13 But forasmuch as a great parte of men, imagineth righteousness to be made of faith and worke, yet vs first shew this also, that the righteousness of faith and worke doe so differ, that when the one in stablished, the other must needs be overthrown. The Apostle faith that he esteemed all things as dung, that he might winne Christ and finde in him the righteousness that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousness that is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Jesus Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries and that here is declared that hee which will obtaine the righteousness of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousness. Therefore in another place he faith, that this was the caufe of fall to the fewes that going about to stablish their owne righteousness, they were not subject to the righteousness of God. If in stablishing our owne righteousness we shake away the righteousness of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousness our owne must be utterly abolished. And he sheweth the same thing, when he faith, that our glorying is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Whereupon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousness of workes, how little fouer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorye vpon. Nowe if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteounesse of workes can no wise be coupled with the righteounesse of faith. To this effect he speakeith so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, that hee leaueth no room to for calculations or shiftes: If (faith he) Abraham was iustified by workes, he hath glorye. And immediately he addeth: but hee hath no glorye in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that hee was not iustified by workes. Then he bringeth another argument by contrarys, when rewarde is rendered to workes, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deservings of workes. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteounesse made of faith and workes mingled together.

14 The Sophistlers thinke that they have a sittle shifte, that make to themselves sport & pastime with wresting of Scripture & with vaine calculations. For they expound works in that place to be those which men not yet regenerate do only literall & by the endeavours of free wil without the grace of Christ: and do say that it belongeth not to spirituall workes. So by their opinion a man is iustified both by faith & by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ & fruites of regeneration. For they say that Paul spake so for none other cause, but to convince the Jewes, trusting vpon their own workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteouenesse to themselues, the onely spirite of Christ doeth give it vs, and not any indenour by our owne motion of nature. But they doe not mark the in the comparison of the righteounesse of the law and the righteounesse of the Gospel, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title ouer they be adorne. For hee teacheth that this is the righteounesses of the law, that he should obtaine salvation that hath performed that which the law commandeth; and that this is the righteounesse of faith, if wee beleue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreover wee shall hereafter shew in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteounesse are severall benefites of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the verie spirituall workes come not into the account when the power of iustifying is ascribed to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen nowe allledged) that Abraham had anything whereupon to glorye before God, because hee was not made righteous by workes: this ought not to be restrained to the literall & outward kind of vertues, or to the endeavours of free will. But although the life of the patriarch Abraham were spiritual and in manner Angellike, yet he had not sufficient deservings of workes to purchase him righteounesse before God.

15 The scoolemen teach a little more grossly that mingle their preparations: but these do lesse infect the simple and vnskilfull with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretence of Spirite and grace hiding the mercie of GOD which only is able to appease trembling consciences. But wee confesse with Paul that the doers of the law are iustified before God: but because wee are all farre from the keeping of the law, hereupon wee gather, that the workes which should most of all haue availed to righteounesse, doe nothing helpe vs because we lacke them. As for the common Papistes or Scoolemen, they are

are in this point doubly deceived: both because they call faith an assurednes of conscience in looking for reward at the hand of God for sufferings, and also because they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousness, but the holy ghost helping to the endeavouer of holinesse.
They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first believe that there is a God, and then that he is a renderer of reward to them that seek him. But they mark not, what is the manner of seeking. And that they are deceived in the name of grace, is plainly proved by their owne writing.
For Lombard expoundeth, that justification by Christ is giv'n us two ways, First (faith he) the death of Christ doth justify vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the same death sinne is destroyed, wherby Satan held vs captive, so that now he hath not whereby to condemn vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in justification, to be so farre as wee are directed to good workes by the grace of the holy Ghost. He would forsooth have followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a farre off, & goeth farre out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkenth it; if there bee any thing in Augustine not verie vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen have strayed from work to workes, till with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian courser. And the verie sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be receiv'd. For though he singularly well taketh from man all praise of righteousness, & assigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby wee are renewed into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

16 But the Scripture, when it speaketh of the righteousness of faith, lea-deth vs to a farre other ende, that is to say, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne workes, we should only looke vnto the mercie of God & perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of justification, 1st God vouchfauceth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere and free goodnes, considering nothing in him but mistery whereby he may be moved to mercie, forasmuch as he feeth him altogether naked & void of good works, fetching from himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which dispairing vpon his owne workes cauffeth at the summe of his salvation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into possession of his salvation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining forgiveness of sinnes by means of righteous-nesse of Christ, he is justifieth: & although he be regenerate by the spirit of God, he thinketh vpon continual righteousness laid vp for him not in the good workes to which he applieoth himselfe, but in the only righteousness of Christ. When these things shalbe everie one particularly w eyed, they shall give a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth, But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that wee may haue the whole matter truely declared and surely proved.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that wee haue before saide to be betweene faith & the Gospel: because it is said for this cause that faith justifieth, for that it receiued & embraceth the righteousness offered in the Gospel. And whereas it is said to be offered by the Gospel, thereby all con-consideration of workes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times else where, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romanes, comparing the law and the gospel together he faith: the righteousness that is by the law is thus, the man that doth these things shall live in them. But the righteousness that is of faith offereth salvation, if thou believe in thy heart & confesse with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Gospel, that the law giueth righteousness to workes, and the gospel giueth free righteousness without help of workes? It is a notable place, & that may deliver us out of many hard doubts, if wee understand that the same righteousnesse that is giuen vs by the gospel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doeth more than once with great seeming of contrarietie set the promisie by way of opposition against the lawe, as if the inheritance be of the law, then is it not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truely the law is selfe hath also her pro-misses. Therefore there must needs be in the promises of the gosepl, something different & diverse from the promises of the law, vnlesse we will con-fesse that the comparison is very fond. But what diuerfity shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and withheld by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promises of the law hang vpon the condition of workes?

Neither let any man here carpe against me, and saye, that in this place the righteousnes is rejected which men of their own force and free will would compell God to receiue? forasmuch as Paul, without exception teacheth that the law in commaunding proficeth nothing: because there is none not only of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that shall the Loure undoubtedly is the chiefe point of the lawe: when the Spirit of God did receiue the law, why is it not as a cause of righteousness, but for that even in the holy ones it is unperfect, and therefore of itselfe deserueth no rewar-18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is justified by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall live in them. Howe could this argument otherwise stande together, vnlesse we agree vpon this point, that workes come not into the account of faith, but are utterly to be se-uered from it? The law (faith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because workes are required to the righteousness thereof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteousness of faith. By this relation it ap-peareth that they which are justified by faith are justified beside the deserving of workes, yea without the deserving of workes, because faith recei-ued righteousses which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospel differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousness to workes, but setteth it in the only mercy of God. Like hereunto is that which he affirme-the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glorifie vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteousses, & he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteousness of faith, when there are no workes to which a reward is due. Where be workes (faith he) due rewarde is renderd vnto them: that which is given to faith is freely given. For the verie meaning of the words that he vieth in that place serue to prove the same. Wheras he adiouneth within a little after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, he whereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is received by faith: & howe commeth, but because faith without any help of works leaneath wholly vp6 the mercie of God? And in the same meaning, without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousness of God was openly shewed without the law, although it haue witnesse borne of it by the law & the prophets: because excluding the law, he faith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come emptie that we may receiue it.

19 By this time the reader perceiveth with what equitie the Sophisters do at this day cauil at our doctrine, when wee faie, that man is justifie by faith only. They dare not deny that man is justifie by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onlie, is never expressed, they cannot abide to have such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely given? How can free gift agree with workes? And with what cauillations will they mocke out, that which hee faith in another place, that the righteousness of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospel? If righteousness be manifestly shewed in the Gospel, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousness, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stande vpon not onelie a falle, but also a foolish shift about this excluisive word, Onlie. Doeth not he perfectly e- nough giue all things to onelie faith, that taketh all thinges from worke? What, I pray you meane these sayinges: that righteousness was manifestly shewed without the law: that man is justifie freely & without the workes of the law? Here they have a witty shift to escape withall, which although they deuised it not themselues, but borrowed it of Origen & certaine of the olde writers, yet is verie foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall worke of the lawe, not the morall, are excluded. They profit so with continuall brawling, that they knowe not the verie first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostle doted wh6 he alleageth these places to prove his sayinge? The man that shall do these things shall liue in them: and, Cursed is every one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the volume of the law. Vnleefe they be madde, they wil not faie that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatened onelie to the breakers of them. If these places be to be understanded of the morall law, it is no doubt that the morall worke also are excluded from the power of justifying. To the same purpose serue these arguments: he vieth: because the knowledge of sinne was by the lawe, therefore righteousness is not by the lawe. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousness. Because the lawe cannot make conscience assured, therefore it cannot giue righteousness. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousness, therefore righteousness is not a rewarde of worke, but is giuen being not due.

Because we are justified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had beene a law giuen that might giue life, then righteousnes were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all under sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleuers. Let them now fondey say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of mannters: but verie children would hifie out so great shamelesnesse. Therefore let vs hold this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of justifying is taken awaie from the law.

20 But if any man maruaille why the Apostle vsed such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it, For, although works be so highly esteemed, yet they have that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousnes of works, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime anie reward as due vnto the, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefor this of the bountifullnes of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name & reward of righteousnes: & they bee of value only for this cause, whiche the purpose of him that dooth them is by the to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to prove that Abraham could not be justified by works, alreadegoth that the law was giue, almost four hundred & thirtie yeres after the covenant made. Unlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous works before the publishing of the lawe. But because he knewe that there was no such value in works but by the testimonie and vouchsaieing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the lawe they had no power to justifie. Wee understand why he namelie expresseth the worke of the lawe, when he meaneth to take away justificacion from anie works because controverzie may be moued of those & none other. Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he saith that by the testimonie of David blessednes is alligned to that man to whom the Lord imputeth righteousnes without works. Therefore they can with no caullations bringe to passe, but that we shall get this general exclisive onely. And they do in vain seek that trifling surteenie, that we are justified by that only faith which worketh by love, so that righteousnes must stand vpo love. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith justifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of justifying from that effectualnes of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane justifie, but because it bringeth vs into the communicating of the righteousnes of Christ. Or els all that which the apostle so earnestly preffeth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (faith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to deed. But to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that justifieth the unrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousnes. Could he speake more evidently than in so saying, that there is no righteousnes of faith but where there are no worke to which any reward is due: and that onely then faith is imputed vnto righteousnes, when righteousnes is giuen by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is saide in the definition, that the righteousnes of faith is the reconciliatiue with God, which confieth

fifth upon the only forgiveness of sins. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God refleth upon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esa excellently well set out in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortened, that he is not able to save: nor his ears dull that he cannot heare: but your iniquities have made disagreement betwenee you and your God, & your sins have hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the diuision betweene man & God, & the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousness to have anie fellowship with sin. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enimie to God til he be restored into favour by Christ Whó therefore the Lorde receiued into ioyning with him, he is faide to iustifie: because he can neither receive him into favour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him rightous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiveness of sinnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be judged by their works, they shalbe found stil sinners indeede, who yet must be free & cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleased by having the spots of their sins wiped away by forgivenes, that such a righteousness male in one word be called the forgivenes of sinnes.

22 Both these are most clearly to be seene from these words of Paul, which I haue alreadie alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing their sinnes to man, and he hath left with us the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the sum of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. Here he nameth righteousnes and reconciliation without difference, that wee may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousness to be when our sinnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou hearest that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing sinnes. So to the Romane: hee prooueth by the testimonie of David, that righteousness is imputed to man without works, because David pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgivin, whose sinnes are couered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without dout by blessednes he there meaneth righteousness. As fith he affirmeth the fame to stand in the forgiveness of sinnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of John the Baptist fingeth that the knowledge of salvation is establisad in the forgiveness of sinnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermo which he made to the Antichians concerning the summe of salvation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this manner: by him forgivenesse of sinnes is preached vnto you, & every one that beleueth in him is iustified from all these things, from which ye could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. The Apostle so knitteth the forgivenesse of sinnes with righteousness, that he sheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reasoneth that the righteousness is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnes of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange vnused speech, that the faithful are righteous before God, nor by works, but by free acceptation: such both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also doe sometime so speake. For Augustine faith thus in one place: The righteousness of the saints in this world standeth rather in forgiveness of sins, than in perfection of vertues. Wherewith the notable sentences of Bernard: Not to sin is the righteousness of God; but the righteousness of man, is the mercyfull kindnes of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is the true righteous in abolution, and therefore that they only are righteous that have obtained pardon by mercie.

23 Hereupon also followeth this, that by the onely mean of Christes righteousness we obtaine to be justified before God. Which is as much in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousness of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthy to be heedfully marked. For that trifling error vanishteth away, to say that man is therefore justified by faith, because faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine above taught, that they can never be made to agree together. For it is no doubt he is void of his own righteousness, that is taught to seek righteousness without himself. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly when he writeth he which knew no sinne was made for vs a propitiatory sacrifice to cleanse away sin, ye might be made the righteousness of God in him. You see our righteousness is not in vs but in Christ, & that it belongeth to vs only by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because wee possess all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that in another place he teacheth, that sin was condened of sin in the flesh of Christ, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but which we obteane by imputation. For the Lord Christ doth in such sort communie his righteousness with vs, that after a certain marvelous maner, he pourreth the force thereof into vs, so much as pertained to the judgements of God. It appeareth that he did no otherwise mean, by the other sentence which he had spoken a little before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are justified. What is it else to set our righteousness in the obedience of Christ, but to affirm hereby only we are accounted righteous, because the obedience of Christ is imputted vnto vs as if it were our own? Therefore me thinks that Ambrose hath excellently well showed how there is an example of this righteousness in the blessing of Iacob. For as Iacob having not of him selfe deuered the preeminence of the first begotten sonne, hid himselfe in the apparel of his brother, & being clothed with his brothers coat, ye saueor of a most sweet smell, he crept into ye favor of his father, & received ye blessing to his own commodity vnder the person of another: so we do lie hidden vnder the precious purenes of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimony of righteousness in the sight of God. The wordes of Ambrose are these: Whereas I saueor of the garment, peraduenture this is meant thereby, that we are not justified by works but by faith; because fleshly weakenesse hindereth worke, but the brightness of faith which maketh forgiveness of sinnes, ouershadoweth the errour of deedes. And truly so it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto salvation, it is necessary for us to smell sweetly with his odour, and to have our faults covered and barred with his perfection.

The xii. Chapter.

That, to the end we may be fully persuaded of the free justification, we must lift up our minds to the judgement seat of God.

Although it appeareth by most euident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not cleerely perceiue howe necessarie they be, vn till we have seene those things that ought to be the groundes of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that wee purpose not to speake of the righteousnesse of a worldly judicial court, but of the heauenly judgement seate: that we should not measure by our owne small portion, by what vprightnes of workes Gods judgemenct may bee satisfied. But it is maruellous to see with what rafines & boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be seene howe none doe more boldly or with fuller mouths (as the faying is) prate of the righteousnesse of workes, than they that are either monstrously sicke of open outward diseases, or bee ready to burst with inward vices. That cometh to passe because they think not upon the righteousnesse of God, whereas if they had never so little feeling, they would never make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such & so perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but every way whole & absolute, & defiled with no vnclenesse: such as neuer was & neuer shall be able to be found in man. It is in deed easie and ready for every man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthinesse of workes to justify men: But when they come into the light of God, such dalliance must auoide, because there is earnest doing vfed, & no trifling strifes about words. To this, to this I saie, we must apply our mind, if we will profitably enquire of true righteousness, how we may answer the heauenlie judge wher he calleth us to account. Let vs think him to be a judge, not such a one as our owne understandings doe of themselves imagine; but such a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whose brightnes the starrs shalbe darkened, by whose strengthe the hills doe melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wise are taken in their falsitie, by whose purenesse all things are proued vnpure, whose righteousness the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocet, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pærceeth to the botome of hel. If he(I saie) be to examine mens doings, who shall appear assured before his throne? who shal dwell with a devouing fire? faith the Prophet. Who shall abide with continual burnings? he that walketh in righteousnesses and speaketh truth, &c. But let such a one come forth, whatsoeuer he be. But that answereth maketh, that none commeth forth. For this terrible saying foundeth to the contrarie: Lord if thou mark iniquities, Lord, who shall abide it? truely all must needs immediately perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be justified if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer than his maker? Beholde they that serue him are not faithful, and he hath found foud peruersnes in his Angels. How much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay and that have an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes? they shall be cut downe from the morning to the evening. Behold among his Saintes there is none faithfull, & the heauens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt indeed that in the booke of Iob, is mention made of a righteousnes that is higher than the keping of the law. And it is good to understand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stand to the trial of that righteousnesse that passeth all senses. Therefore although Iob be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amased, and not able to speake because he feeth that very angel like holines can not appease God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore wil at this time ouerpass that righteousnesse which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than senselesse if so many curses with the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, and among other this generall curse, Curfed is every one that doeth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shall be but vanity, and cold, vnlesse every man yelde himselves giltee before the heauenly judge, and willingly throw downe and abase himselves, being careful how he may be acquitted.

To this, to this I say, we should have lift vp our cies, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainely to reioyce. It is in deed easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for every man to think him selfe to have somwhat which other ought not to despise. But whë we raise vp to haue respect vnto God then sodainly that confidence falleth to the ground & cometh to naught. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heauen, for the sight of the eye, so long as it continueth in viewing things that lie neere vnto it, doth shew of what pearcing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being dazeled & dulled with the too great brightness thereof, it feeleth no lesse febleness of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perceived strength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let vs not deceive our selues with vain confidence, although we count our selues either equal or superior to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose will this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildnes can not be tamed with these admonitions, he will answere to vs as he said to the Pharisees: you be they that justifie your selues before men; but that which is high to me is abominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boast of thy righteousnes among men, while God from heaué abhorreth it. But what say the servants of God that are truely instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into judgement with thy servant, because every liuing man shall not be justified in thy sight. Another faith, although in somewhat divers meaning: Man can not be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answeare one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousnesse of God, even such as can bee satisfied with no workes of men, to whom when it examine the vs of a thousande offences, we can not purge our selues of one. Such a righteousnesse had had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceived, when he professed that he knew himself guilty in nothing, but that he was not thereby justified.

3 And not only such examples are in the holy Scriptures, but also godly writers do shew that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine saith, All that godlie that groan under this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weake paper of life have this onlie hope that we have one mediateur Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our sins. What faith her? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it onely, he leaueth none other. And Bernard faith, And indeed where is safe and stedfast rest and assuredness for the weake, in the woundes of our Saviour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as hee is mightier to faue. The world rageth, the body burdeneth, the duell lieth in wait: I fall not, because I am builded upon the sure rocke, I have sinned a grievous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be ouertroubled, because I shall remember the woundes of the Lorde. And hereupon afterwarde he concludes, Therefore my merite is the Lordes taking of mercie, I am not vterly without merite, so long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also have as many merites. Shall I sing mine owne righteousness? Lorde I will remember only thy righteousnes. For that is also my righteousness, for hee is made vnto me righteousnes of God. Againe in an other place, This is the whole merite of man, if hee put his whole hope in him that saueth whole man. Likewiue where retaining peace to himselfe hee leaueth the glorie to God, To the (faith hee) let glorie remaine vnminished: it shall bee well with mee, if I have peace, I forswore glorie altogether, lest if I wrongfullie take vpon me which is not mine owne. I looke also that which is offered me. And more plainly in an other place he faith: Why should the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer way to glorie vpon the purpose of God? So there is no caufe why thou shouldest ask, by what merites we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophete, I will doe it, not for your sake, but for mine owne sake, faith the Lorde. It sufficeth for merite, to know what merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presume of merites, so to be without merites sufficeth to judgement. Whereas hee freely vseth this word Merites for good workes, we must therein beare with the custome. But in the en"d his purpose was to make hypocrites afraide, that wildly range with licentioiusnesse offinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himselfe, saying: Happie is the Church that neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumptio without merites. It hath whereupon to presume, but not merites. It hath merites, but to defence, not to presume, Is not the verie not presuming a defeuring? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, having large matter to glorifie vpon, eu'n the manie merices of the Lorde.

4 This is the truth. The exercised consciences perceive this to bee the onely sanctuarie of saetie, wherein they may safely rest themselues when they have to doe with the judgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed seemed most bright in the night season, do loosen their brighnes, with sight of the sunne, what thinke we shalbe come euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shalbe a most sever examination, that shal procure into the most hidde thoughts of the heart, and (as Paul faith) shall reveale the secretes of darkness, and disclose the hidden thinges of the heart, which shall compel the lurking & vnwilling confiencie to utter all thinges that now are fallen out of remembrance. The diuell our accuser will present vs, which is princie to all the wicked deedes that he hath mowed vs to doe. There the outward pompos thewes of good workes which now one lie are esteemed, hath nothing profit vs. Onely the purenesse of will shal be required. Wherefore the hypocristie, not only whereby every man knowing himselfe guiltie before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherewith every man deceiveth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shal fall downe confounded, howsoever it now be proude, with more than dronken boldnes. They that bend not their wills to such a sight, may indeed for a short time sweetlie and pleasantly frame a righteousnes to themselfes, but it is such a righteousnesse as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the judgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that that earnestlie as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousness, shall certainlie finde that all the works of men, if they be judged by their owne wor- thines, are nothing but desilings and fitthines: that that which among the common people is accompted righteousnes, is before God mere wickednes: that which is judged puritie, is vnclannes; that that which is reck- oned glorie, is but shame.
Of the maner how to receiue

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grieue vs to descende to looke vpon our selues without flatterie or blind affection of loue. For it is no maruell if we be so blinde in this behalfe, forasmuch as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tendernes of toward himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs al. To euerie man (faith Salomon) his owne waie is right in his owne eies. Againe, All the ways of man seeme cleane in his owne eies. But what is he acquitted by this blind- nes? No, But (as he further faith in the same place) the Lord weigheth the heartes, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the out- warde visor or righteousnes that he beareth in resemblance, in the mean- time the Lorde with his ballance examineth the hidden vnclannes of the heart. Therefore if we do nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wil- fully moke our selues to our owne destruction, but that wee maie trie our selues rightly, we must necessarily call back our confiencie to the judgment seat of God. For we do altogether neede his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruerse, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then and never till then, we shall clerelie perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottenenesse and a worme, abominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednes as water is far from being justified before God. For who shoulde make that cleane that is conceiued of vnclanennesse? not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Job saide of himselfe? If I will go about to shewe my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: if I will shewe my selfe righteous: it will proove me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onelie, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israel; that all went astray like sheep, that every one turned aside to his own way. For he there comprehendeth all the, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examination ought to proceed so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwne downe with all, and by that meanes prepare vs to receive the grace of Christ. For he is deceived that thinketh himselfe able to receive the enjoying of this grace, vntill hee haue first throwne downe all haughtiness of minde. This is a knowne saying: that God confoundeth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble.

6 But what waie is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needie and empiric, shoulde giue place to the mercie of God? For I doe not call it humblenesse, if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs. And hitherto they have taught a very hurtfull hypocrifie that haue joyned these two thinges together, that we must thinke humbleness of our selues before God, and that we must make some account of our owne righteousnes. For if we confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we doe wickedly liue vnto him: but we can not thinke as we ought, but that by & by all that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared saluation for the humble people, and abaceme for the cies of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no entrie open to saluation, vntil thou haue laid away al pride & taken to the perfec humbleness: then, that the same humblenes is not a certaine modestie whereby thou giuest ouer to the Lord a haire breth of thine own right, as they are called humbleness before me that do neither presumptuously aduance themselues, nor reprochfully triumph over other, although they stand vp some estimation of their owne excellencie: but an unsaine submission of a mind thrown downe with feeling of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so echwhere described in the word of God. When the Lord faith thus in Zephaniahs: I will take away out of thee him that outragiousely reioyce, & I will leaue in the middes of thee the afflicted man & the poore man, and they shall truist in the Lord: dooth he not there plainly shew who be humble? euene they that lie afflicted with knowledge of their owne pouertie. On the other side hee calleth the proud, outragious reioycers, because men ioying in prosperitie are wont to reioyce without measure. But to the humble whom hee purposeth to save, he leauneth nothing but to trust in the Lorde. And likewise it is saide in Esai: Whom shall I look to, but to the poore and contrite in spiritt, & him that feareth my words? Again: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on high, & in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spiritt, to quicken the spirite of the humble and the heart of the contrite. When thou goest hearest the name of contrition, understand thereby the wound of the heart, that sufuereth not a man throwen downe on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of GOD be aduaunced with the humble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mighty hand of God to thy shame and disgrace.

7 And our best Schoolemaster, thinking it not enough to shewe it out in wordes, hath also set it out vnito vs in a parable the image of true humility as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publican that standing at a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eies to heauen, with much knocking on his breast, praieth in this wise: "Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner. Let vs not think these to be tokens of attained modestie, that hee dare not looke vp to heauen, nor to come nearer, that with knocking his breast he confesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs knowe that they bee testimonies of inward affection. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee which thanketh God that he is not of the common sort of men, either an oppresser, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fasted twice on the Sábado, & gave tithes of all that hee posseffed. He doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousness which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfauored and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednes is justified. Hereby we may see, how great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the heart cannot be open to receive his mercie, vnlesse it bee first voide of all opinion of his owne worthines. When this opinion hath posseffed the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercie to enter. And that no man should doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach libertie to the captiue, & deliverance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourne: to give them grace for ashes, oil for mourning, the robe of praise for the spirit of sorrow. According to this commissiō, he calleth none but them that labour and are laden to take part of his liberalitie. And in another place he faith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8 Therefore if we wil give place to the calling of Christ, let all arroganie & carelesnes depart far away frō vs. Arroganie growth of a foolish persuacion of our owne righteousnes, when a man thinketh himselfe to haue somewhat, by the defending whereof he may be commended before God, carelessness maie be euen without any persuasion of workes. For many sinners, because being dronke with sweetnesse of vices they think not vp on the judgement of God, he it as it were senselie assynd with a diseas of drouhnles, that they aspire not to the mercie offered them. But we must not lesse shake off suche dull sluggishtenesse, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our selues, that we may without encombrance haisten to Christ, that we being emiptie and hungrie maie be filled with his good things. For we shall never sufficiently haue trust in him, vnlesse we utterly distrust of our selues, we shall never sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first thrown downe in our selues. We shall never sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse we be first desolate in our selues. Therefore we be then meet to take holde of and obtayne the fauour of God, casting away all trust of our selues, but trusting vpon the only assurednesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine faith) forgetting our owne deservinges, we embrace the gifts of Christ.

Both pride and carelesnes must be avoided.

De verbis Apost. cap. 8.
The grace of Christ.

Because if he sought deferuings in vs, wee shoulde not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very wel accordeth, comparing proud men to vnafaithfull seruantes, that arrogantly claime anie thing be it neuer so little to their owne deferuings: because they do wrongfully kepe to themselues the prais of grace passing by them, as if a wall wold say that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receiueth through a window. But, not to tarie longer hereupon, let vs take a short but a general & sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath utterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of rightcounses, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of rightcounses. Because every man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he resteth in himselfe.

The xiii. Chapter,

That there are two things to be marked in free justification.

And here are always two things to be principally looked vnto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lord his glory vnminished, & as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an untroubled quietnes & calm tranquillitie before his judgiment. We see how oft & how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to giue onely to God a confession of prais, when we entreate of rightcounses. And the Apostle teftifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpose of giuing vs rightcounses in Christ, & he might shew his owne rightcounses. And what a shewing y shuld be, he declareth immediately after that is, if he alone be known to be righteous, & y justifieth him that is of the faith of Jesu Christ. Thou seest y the rightcounses of God is not sufficiently set out, vnles he alone be acquited righteous, & do communicate the grace of rightcounses to them that deserue it not. By this meanes he will have euery mouth to be stopped, & the whole world to be made subjeiect to him. For while man hath anie thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somwhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezechiel he techeath how much wee glorifie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickednesse. You shall remember (faith he) the waies and all the wicked doings wherewith youe haue beene defiled. And ye shall be displeased with your selues in your owne sight, in all the euils that youe haue committed; And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall doe good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that wee being brooded with knowledge of our owne iniquitie should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to steal away from the Lorde any partie: he it never so final of the praise of his free goodnes? Likewise Jeremie when hee crieth out, Let not the wise man glory in his wedome, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him thinke of their glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare y somwhat is diminished from Gods glory, if ma glory in himselfe? To this purpose truely doth Paul apply those wordes, when he teacheth that all the partes of our salvation are reposd in Christ, that wee shoulde not glory but in the Lorde. For his meaning is that he riefeth vp against God and darkeneth his glory, whosoeuer thinkeath that he hath any thing.
Cap. 13. Of the manner how to receive thing be it never so little of his owne.

2 This is the truth, we never true glory in him, vnlesse we be utterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holde[n] for a catholike principle, that all they glory against God that glory in themselves. For Paul judgeth that onely by this meanse the world is made subject to God, which all matter to glory upon is utterly taken from men. Therefore Esa, when he declareth that Israel shall have their justification in God, faith alio that they shall there also have their praise: as though he should say, that the Lord doth to this end justify them the elect that they should glory in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be praised in the Lord, hee had taught in the verse next before; that is, that to shew that our righteousnesse and strength are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed with an oath, that a man shoulde not thinke that hee shall be discharged with I wote not what fained humilitie. And let no man here alleage for excuse that he doth not glory when without arrogance he reknowledgeth his owne righteousness: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glory. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteousness we must haue regard to this end, that the praise thereof remaine with the Lord whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declaration of his righteousness (as the Apostle teftifieth) he hath poured out his grace vpon vs, that he might bee just and justifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in another place, where he had taught that the Lord gave vs salvation, to set out the glory of his name, afterward as it were repeating the same thing he addeth: see are faied by grace and by the gift of God, not by worke, that none should glory. And when Peter teffifeth that we are called vnto hope of salvation that wee should declare the powers of him that hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the only praises of God to sound in the cares of the faithful, that they shoulde with deep silence opprrefe all arrogancie of the sifie. In a summ, man can not without robbery of God chalenge to himselfe any one crum of righteousness; because euery so much is plucked & taken away from the glory of Gods righteousness.

3 Now if we ask by what mean the conscience may be quieted before God, we shall finde no other meanes but if free righteousness bee given vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this saying of Salomon, Who shall say: I haue cleansed my heart, I am made cleane from my sinnes? Truely there is no man that shall not be overwhelmed with infinite filthinesse. Therefore let euery perfect man descend into his owne conscience, and call his doings to account: what end shall he have? Shall he sweetly rest as though all things were in good order betweene him and God? and shall he not rather be vexed with terrible tormentes, when he shall feele matter of damnation abiding in himselfe, if he be judged according to his worke? The conscience if it look vpon God, must of necessity either haue assured peace with his judgement, or be befiegled with the terrors of hell. Therefore wee profit nothing in disputing of righteousness vnlesse we establish such a righteousness, with the stedfastnesse wherof our soule may be stayed in the judgement.

ment of God. Where our souls shall have whereby it maye both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receive his judgement, unshaken, then and not till then let us know that we have found an unfaigned righteousnes. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much to this point, with whose words I had rather expresse it than with mine own. If (faith he) the promise of inheritaunce be of the law, faith is made void, the promise is made abolished. Hee first inferreth that faith is disanulled and made void if the promise of righteouenes have respect to the defierings of our works, or doe hang upon the keeping of the law. For so could never any man assu- redly rest in it: because it coulde never come to passe that anye man might assuredly determine with himselfe that he had satisfied the law, as indeede never anie man doeth by workes fullie satisfie it. Whereof, that we should not neede to seeke far for testimonies to prove it, euery man maie be a wit- nesse to himselfe that will with a right eye behold himselfe. And hereby appeareth, in how deepe and darke corners hypocrisie buried the mindes of men, while they so carelesly beare with themselves, that they sticke not to for their owne flatteries against the judgemet of God, as though they wold bind to a stay his judiciale proceeding. But the faithful that do sincerely ex- amine themselves, are grieved and tormented with a farre other maner of carefulnes. Therefore there should so enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a verie despaire where ech man for himselfe should make ac- count, with how grete a burden of debt he is still overpressed, & how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Lo, how faith is by this mean alreadie expressed & extinguished. For to waver, so varie, to be carried vp & down, to stick fast in doubting, to be holden in suspence, to stagger, & at length to despaire, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy mind with constant certainty and perfect assurednes, & to haue whereupon to rest and fasten thy foote.

4. He adioyneth also an other thing, that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof doe hang upon our defierings, when shall we come thus far as to desierue the bountifulnes of God? Also this second point hangeth vpon the former: For the pro- mise shall not be fulfilled but to them that beleue it. Therefore if faith bee fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise. Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to stabifie the promise. For it is abundantly vell stabified when it resteth vpon the onlie mercie of God: because his mercie & truth are with a perpetual knot ioyned together, that is to say, whatsoever God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So David before that he required saluation by the word of God first determyneth the cause thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (faith he) come vnto me, thy saluation according to thy word. And rightfully: because God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise but of his owne owne mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten all our hope and not to looke to our owne workes, to seeke anye helpe of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake anie new thing: Augustine doth also teache that we ought so to doe. Christ (faith hee) shall regaine for euer in his succedeantes, GOD hath promised it, and I cannot disallow it, God hath faide it, and if that bee not enough, GOD hath sware it.

Therefore

Therefore forasmuche as the promise is stablished, not according to our deservings, but according to his mercy, no man ought to speake fearfully of it, of which he can not dout, Bernard also saith, The discipkes of Christ say: Who is he that denieth? But he answered, this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is at our confidence; this is our only corfort, this is our whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibility, what saie we of this? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of loue or hatred? Who hath known the Lords meaning? Or who hath beene his counsellor? Here nowe faith must of necessity helpe vs, here must his truth succour vs, that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be recouered by the Spirt, and his Spirt growing it may perswade our heartes that we are the sons of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and justifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meanesse passing from the eternall predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefly let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of confidence: and wherfoere there is any doubting or uncertainie it pronounceth that they be voide. Against it pronounceth that they doe nothing but stagger and waue, if they rest upon our owne workes. Therefore wee must needs either lose righteousnesse, or we must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift vp her cures & shut her eyes, that is to say, to bee heedfully bent to the promise onely, and to turn away her thought from all mans worthinesse or deservinge. So is that notable prophecy of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednes of the land shall be done away, a man shall call his friend vnder his vine and vnder his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull do no otherwise enjoy true peace but after obteining of the forgiuenes of sinnes. For this cauillation is to be remembred in the Prophets, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outward blessings of God as figures of the spiritual things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace & our peace, because he appeareth at the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seek by what meanes he doth it, we must needs come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For he shall neuer cease to tremble for feare that shall not determine that God is appeased by the only satisfauntory cleaning wherein Christ hath sustained his wrath. Finally peace is no where els to be sought for but in the terrors of Christ our redeemer.

5. But why doe I vie to darke a testimonie? - Paul every where doth inuen, there is peace or quietie left to confenciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be justifie by faith. And he therewithal declareth why he that is in Christ, namely when the loue of God is功率 into our heartes by the holi Ghost: as if he had saide, that our confenciences cannot otherwise be quieted, vnlesse we be certeinly perswaded that we please God. Whereupon also in another place he crieth out in the person of all the gods, Who shall feuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because wee shal tremble even at euery little breath, til we be arryved into the haven: but we shall be without care euery in the darkenesse of death, so long as the Lorde shall shew himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore who soever prate prate that we are justified by faith, because being regenerate we are just by Psalm 23:4.

Living spiritually, they never tamst the sweetnesse of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull vnto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks and whatsoever other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith unless it teach & put vs in mind of that most sweet name of Father, yea vntilfe it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba father. Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he faith that in Christ we have boldnesse and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truely this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration; which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in itself manifold matter of doubting. Wherefore we must of necessity come to this medicin, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, but because being graffed into the body of Christ they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching justification, faith is a thing mereely passyve, bringing nothing of our owne to the recovering of the favour of God, but receiuing of Christ that which we want.

The xiiiij. Chapter.

What is the beginning of justification, and the continual proceeding thereof.

That the matter may be made more plaine, let vs searche, what may be the righteousness of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatry: or being entred into profession by sacramentes, denying God with vn cleannesse of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Christes no further than in name: or they be hypocrites, which cover the wickednesse of their heartes, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirite of God, they endeavour themselves to true holiness. Specially when they are to be judged by their natural gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be found one sparcells of goodnesse, vntilfe peraduenture we will accuse the Scripture of falsehood, when it setteth out all the sons of Adam with these titles that they be of sordward and stubborne heart, that all the imagination of their heart is evil from the irracence, that their thoughts be vain, that they have not the feare of God before their eies, that none of them understandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be flesh, by which wordes are understanded all those workes which Paul reprehendeth, fornication, vn cleannesse, vnchastity, riotousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witchcrafts, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissension, sectes, eneies, man slavers, and whatsoever filthinesse and abomination may be deviused. This forsooth is the worthinesse, with confidence whereof they must be proud. But if anye among them excell with such honestie of manners as may have some shew of holinesse among men: yet because we knowe that God regardeth not the outward glisteringe, we must search the verie fountaine of workes if we wil have them to ausie any thing to righteousnesse. We must (say) thoroughly look into them, from what affection of heart these workes proceede. But although here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in verie fewe wordes, I wil follow as much as I may a briefnes in teaching.

Kk 4

2. First I deny not that whatsoever excellent gifts appeare in the vnbelievers, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I so differ from common judgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betweene the justice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Trajanus: & the rage, intemperance, and crueiltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthy lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Vespasian: and (that we may not tarry upon some special vertues or vices) betweene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right & wrong, that it appeareth even in the dead image thereof. For what thing shall there remaine wel ordered in the world, if we co found these together? Therefore such a difference betweene honest & vn honest doings, the Lord hath not onely engraunen in the mindes of all men, but also doeth oft confirmes it with the dispensation of his prouidence. For wee see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men do follow vertue, Not bicaus that outward image of vertue deserveth so much as the least benefit of his: but so it pleath him to declare by prooue how much true righteousnes pleath him, when he suffereth even outward & fainted righteousnes not to be without reward. Wherupon followeth that which we even now confessed, that these vertues such as they be, or rather images of vertues are the gifts of God, for as much as there is nothing in any wise praise worthie, which proceedeth not from him.

3. But nevertheless it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are strangers from the true religion of the one God, howeuer they be accounted worthie of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthy of no reward, but rather are worthie of punishment, because they doe with defiling of their hart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God to preserue the fellowship of men with justice, continencie, temperance of mind, valiancenes, & wisdome; yet they do very eeuilly execute these good workes of God: because they are restrained from eeuil doing, not by sincere love of goodnes, but either by only an ambitio, or by love of themselues, or by some other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the very vn cleannes of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, that those vices which are wont to deceive by reason of neerenes & likenesse of vertue. Finally when we remember, that the end of that which is right, euens is that God be seaued: whatsoeuer tendeth to any other end, soothwith worthily loogeth the name of right. Because therefore they have not respect to the marke which the wisedome of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongfull end it is sinne. He conclude therefore that all the Fabricii, Scipioes, & Casues, in all those excellent actes of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to have applied them; and that for that cause true righteousnes was not in them: forasmuch as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the endes.

4. More-
The grace of Christ.

4. Moreover if it be true which John faith, that there is no life without the sonne of God: who so have no parte in Christ, what manner of men soever they be, whatsoever they do or goe about, yet they runne forward with their whole course into destruction & judgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that sayde of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteouness from the vnrighteous, by lawe of works; but by the verie lawe of faith, without which, those that seeke good works are turned into sinnes. Wherefore the same Augustine saith verie well in another place, when he comparreth the endeuer of such men to running out of the way. For how much fafer a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is cerayne that they are euil trees, forasmuch as without the communitating of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore bee faire fruitts and beautifull to the eye, yea and sweete to tate, but in no wise good fruitts. Hereby we easily perceiue that whatsoever ma thinketh, purposeth, or dooth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteounes, but of ceraine deferving to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doutfull thing, since it is alreadie proued by the witnesse of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any ma may please God without faith?

5. But there shall yet appeare a plainer prooffe, if the grace of God be in comparison, dietly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out every where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby hee may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodnes preuenteth him. For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when hee lightneth vs with the knowledge of himselfe, he is saide to raife vs from death, & to make vs a newe creature. For wee see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set foorth vnto vs by this title, God (saith he) which is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith hee loved vs, even when we were dead by finnes, hath made vs alieue together in Christ, &c. In another place, where under the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, hee faith: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If wee be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly breatheth downe this arrogancie, in the historie of Job, in these words: who preuenteth me, & I shall render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding appliyeth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lorde, but meere shame of neediness & emptiness. Wherefore in the place aboue cited, to proove that wee are come into the hope of salvation by his grace alone, not by works, he alleageth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we should walk in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his rightouenesse prouoked God, fith our first power to doe good proceeded bold out of regeneration? For as wee are made by nature, oyle shall sooner he wrong euery stone, than a good work euery stone. Truely it is wonderedfull if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace: & that the kindness & love of God our favour toward vs hath appeared, because he hath fauoured vs, not by the works of righteousnes which we have done, but according to his own mercie: that being justified by his grace, wee might be made the heirs of eternall life. By this confession we dispoise man of all righteousness even the least little piece thereof, till he be by only mercie regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousnes of works doe bring any thing toward the justifying of vs, it is falsely said that we are justified by grace. Truely the Apostle had not forgotten himself, when he affirmed justification to be of free gift, which in another place reasoneth that grace is now not grace if works do any thing avail. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he faith ye came not to call righteous m: but sinners? If only sinners are receiued, why seekethe we an entrie by fained righteousness?

6 Still this same thought hath now & then recourse to my minde, that it is peril leafe: I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully & trauaile in proving of this thing as though it were doutsful or dark. But because our enuioufnes is such, as vnlesse it be most straitly thrust out of place, it never yeeldeth to God that which is his. I am compelled to say somewhat the longer upon it. Yet forasmuch as the Scripture is cleere enough in this matter, I will in fighting rather vse the wordes thereof than mine owne. Esay, when he hath declared the uniuersal destrucution of mankind, doeth immediatly after very subtilly adioun the order of reftoring. The Lord hath seene, & it seemed cruel in his eies. And he saw that there is none that offereth himself, & he hath set saluation in his owne ame, & hath strengthened himself with his owne righteousness. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet sayeth: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recovering his saluation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discoursing of the reconciling of sinners to himself, faith: I will espouse thee to me for ever, in righteousness, judgement, grace, and mercie. I will say to her that hath not obtained mercie, thou hast obtained mercie. If such covenante, which it is certaine to be the first esjoyning that wee haue with God, standeth upon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousness. And I woulde faine learne of those men which faine that man meeteth God with some righteousnes of workes, whether they thinke that there is any righteousnes at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madness to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can procede from his enemies, whome he wholly abhorreth with all their doings? That alwey, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it selfeth itself, till being justified, we are received into friendship. If justification be the beginning of love, what righteousnesse of works shall go before it? So John, to turne away that pestilent arrogancie, doeth diligently put in minde howe wee did not first love him. And the selfsame thing the Lorde had long before taught by his Prophete: I will love them faith hee, with a free love, because mine angre is turned. Certainly his love is not prouoked by workes if it hath of his owne accord inclined it self vnto vs.

vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing else; but that no man hath delivered that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entering into the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our owne works. Yea, but howsoever we are redeemed of Christ, yet till we bee by the calling of the father granted into the communion of him, we are both heires of darknes and death, and the enemies of God. For Peter teacheth that we are not cleansed and washed from our uncleannesse by the blood of Christ, vntil the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declarereth that the sanctifying of the Spirit acceptable vnto obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ: If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the blood of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other then a sinner is without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our salvation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: Because when for Christes sake it is giuen to vs to beleue in him, then wee first begin to passe from death into life.

7. Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision above fet bene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the uncleannesse of conscience proueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proueth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet justified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by faith. What catt sinnes being estranged from God bring forth, but that which is accursed in his judgement? With this foolish boldnes in deed, both al wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrites, because howsoever they know that their whole heart is warmeth ful of filthines, yet if they do any works, they haue a shew of goodnes, they thinke them worthie. God should not despise the. Heresies, growth that pernicious error, that being proud guiltie of a wicked & michevous mind, yet they cannot be druen to confess themselves void of righteousness: but even when they acknowledge themselves unrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousness vnto them. This vanitie the lord excellently wele confuteth by the Prophet, As he the priests, saying: if a man carrie sanctified flesh in the hem of his garment, & putreth to it bread or other meat, shall it be sanctified? The priests answered: No. And Haggie said, if a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priests answered: it shalbe defiled. Haggie said: So is this people before my face, faith the Lord; & so all the works of their hands; & all things that they offer to me shall be defiled. I would to God that this saying might either get full credit with vs, or well be setled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, that can abide to be persuaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtieft man, so soone as hee hath performed one or two doughtful deeds of the law, doute not, it shalbe accounted to him for righteousness. But Lord crieth to the contrary, that there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnder the heart be first well cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that all the works whatsoever they be, that proceede from sinneres, as are defiled with vnckleanes of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteousnes depart from these works which are by the Lord's own mouth condemned of filthines. And with howe shalt a similitude doeth he shewe the same? For it might have been obiecte, that whatsoever the Lord had commanded, was inviolably holy. But he on the contrarie side setteeth against them, that it is no maruel, if those things that are hallowed by the law of the Lord, are desiled with the filthinele of naughtie men: whereas an vncklean hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The same matter hee excellently well handeth in Esaye, Offer not (faith he) sacrifice in vain: incense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calendes & solemnitie. They are become tedious to mee, and I have beene wearie with bearing them: when you shall hold vp your handes I will turne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply prayer I will not hear: for your hands are full of blood. Be washed, be cleane, take away the euil of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so loatheth the obeying of his own law? Yes, but he here refuseth nothing is of the naturall obseruing of the law, the beginning whereof he every where teacheth to be the unfaimed feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoever things are offered him are not onely trifles, but sitting and abominaible filthinesse. Now let the hypocrites goe, and keeping peruerfinesse wrapped vp in their heart, endeouer to deforfe the fauour of God with workes. But by this meanes, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath: For to him the sacrifices of wicked are abominaible, and the onely prayer of vpright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold that out of doubt, which ought to bee most commonly known to him, that is euenc but meanly exercised in the Scriptures, that euenc those works that glister most gloriously in men not yet truely sanctifid, are so farre from righteousnes in the sight of the Lord, that they be judged sinnes. And therefore they haue said most truely that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by workes: but contrariwise that workes doe then please, & neuer til then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hand. Moses writeth that the Lord had respect to Abel & to his workes. Se you not how he declareth that God is fauourable to the men, before that he hath respect to their workes? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must go before, that the works which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God: because this saying of Ieremie is alway in force, that the workes of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is onely faith by which the hearts of men are clened, the holy goe fors hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and lively faith.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnes they haue, whome wee haue set in the fourth degree. We graunt that when God by the meane of the righteousnes of Christ, reconcileth vs to himselfe, and giuing vs free forgiuenesse of sinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercie is also conioyned this his beneficall doing, that by his holy spirit hee dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the lustes of our fleth are daily more & more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lorde vnto true purenesse of
of life, when our hearts are framed to the obedience of the laws: that this may be our chief will, to serve his will, and by all means to advance only his glory. But even while by the guiding of the holy ghost we walk in the ways of the Lord, least yet wee forgetting our selves should waxe proud, there are left certaine remnants of imperfection, which may minister vs matter of humiliation. There is none righteous, (faith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What manner of righteousness therefore will they yet get by their works? First, I say, that ye best works that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinked & corrupted with some uncleanesse of the flesh, & hath as it were some dregges mingled with it. I say, let a holy servant of God choose out of all his life the most excellent thing that he shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the partes of it, without doubt he shall finde somwhere in what sauouring of ye rottennes of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing weour chereeful quicke nesse is never such as it ought to be, but in slackings our course our weakenes is much. Although we see that there are evident soule blots where with the works of the holy are bespred, yet grant that they be nothing but most little spots: shall they nothing offend the eyes of God, before whose een the starrs are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be judged in it selfe, deserveth not just reward of shame.

If we could doe any thing perfectly good, yet the evil which we do, would make it unavailing unto righteousness, God judging us according to the rigor of the law which doth not require onely some shing righteous, but forbidden some vurighest shing under points of death and condemnation.

11 Upon these two points we must strongly stand fast: that there was

neuer any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by the seuerest judgement of God, was not damnable. Again, if there be any such (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted & defiled with the sines, wherewith it is certain that the doer of it is laden, it looeth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation. For about the beginning of justification there is no strife betweene vs & the sinner forsooth of scholemen, but that a sinner being freely delivered from damnation obtaineth righteousness, & that by the forgivenes of sines: sauing that they vnder the worde of justification comprehend the renewing wherewith wee are newly formed by the spirit of God vnto the obedience of the lawe and they thus describe the righteousnes of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good works judged righteous before God, & by their deering is accepted. But the Lorde contrariwise pronounced that he impurued to Abraham faith for righteousness, not at the time when he yet serued Idols, but when he had already many yeres excelle in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshippedit God from a pure heart, and had perfourmed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousness repos'd in faith.

Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewhile when it is saide in the Prophet: The righteous man shall liue by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophan manes, whom the Lorde justifieth by converting them to the faith, but the speach is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he saith this verse of David: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. But it is certaine, that David speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himself was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednes we must not have once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Last of all he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliati-on with God is not published for one or two days, but is perpetuall in the church. Therefore the faithfull have eu'n to the end of their life no other righteousness than that which is there set forth, For Christ everlafting remaineth the Mediator to reconcile the father to vs, & the effectualnes of his death is everlafting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewithall our iniquities are covered. Neither doeth Paul to the Ephesians say, we haue the beginning of satisfaction out of grace, but that we are saued by grace, not of workes, that no man should glory.

12 The starting holes which the scholemen do here secke to escape by, do not deliver them. They saie that good works are not by inwarde worthines in themselves of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteousnes, but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace, accepting them. Then, because they be druen to confesse that the righteousness of works is in this life alway vnperfect, they graunt that wee, so long as wee liue, doe neede forgivenes of sines, whereby the want of works may be supplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompensed with works of supererogation. For Paul answereth, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodnesse, whereas with the father embraceth vs in Christ
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. p. 258

Christ, when he clotheth us with the innocence of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficial meanse thereof he may take us for holy, pure, and innocent. For the righteousnesses of Christ (which as truly is perfect, so only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our stead, and be presented at the barre as a suetine. Herewith we being furnished, doe obtaine continual forgiveness of sinnes in faith. With the purenesse hereof our filthinesse and uncleannesses of imperfections being covered are not imputed; but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the judgement of God, until the houre come, when the olde man being slaine & utterly destroyed in vs, the goodness of God shall receive vs into blessed peace with the newe Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lorde in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodys, we shalbe removed into the glorie of the heavenly kingdom.

13 If these things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themselves make us acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the workes themselves please, but in respect that man being covered with the righteousness of Christ, pleaeth God, and obtaineth forgiveness of his sinnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternall life to some certaine workes, but only prononceth that he which doth these things shall live; setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the doule of righteousnes in part is largely confused, sith no other righteousness is admitted into heaven, but a whole obseruance of the law. And no whit found is that which they are wont to babble of supplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not still returne to the same place from whence they are alreadie shut out: that he which keepeth law in part, is by workes so farre righteous? That which no man of sound judgement will grant them, they do too shamelesly take for confessed. So oft the Lord testifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousness of workes, but in the perfect obseruance of his lawe. What obstinacie is it, that wee when we are destitute of that obseruance, least we should seeme spoiled of al glory, that is, to have altogether giuen place to God, do boast ourselves of what not what small pieces of a few workes, and go about by satisfactions to redeem that which wanteth. Satisfactions have alreadie before bin sufficiently overthrown, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Only this I say, that they which to play the fooles, do not wry how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truly they should understand that the whole righteousness of men being laid upon a heap, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abando ned of God, that he thersewithal lost all meanes to recover salvation. Therefore the power of satisfaction is taken away, where with they flatter themselves, but sorely shall never satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purposeth to impure sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be covered and forgiven, before that the Lord have respect to any workes of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiveness of sinnes is of free grace which they do wickedly blaspheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things which are behind vs, & hasting forarde.
Cap. 14. Of the manner how to receive forward to those things that are before vs, run in our race, endeavours to the price of the high calling.

14 But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we have done all things that are commanded vs, we should say that we are unprofitable servants, and that we have done no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commanded vs unfaidly to think and consider with our selves, that we do not any free beneficial doings to him, but to render due service. And worthy. For we are servants endetted in so many services, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts and all our members, were turned into dutiful deeds of the law. And therefore that which he saith, When ye have done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effecte, as if the righteousnes of one man were more than all the righteousnes of men. How therefore may we (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bold as to boast that we have added a heap to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception & say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeavor may proceed beyond necessary duties, which in some behalfse ceaseth those that be from necessity. For this we must altogether holde, that we can imagine nothing that availeth either to the worship or the love of God, which is not comprehended under the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessity.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleged: That among the Corinthians he did of his own will yeilde of his right, which otherwise he might haue vied if he had would, & that hee hath employed vs on them not only so much as hee ought of dutyt, but also hath given them his free travaile beyond the boundes of dutties; But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weake. For false and deceitfull workmen did boast themselves with this alluring shew of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospel, so that Paul was driuen of necessity either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refrain it, then I grant that the Apostle did somthing of supererogation for his Lord. But if this were by right required of a wife distributer of the gospel, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to do. Finally, although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alway true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper possession of bondmen, which it is certaine by the lawe to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath vstered the same in the parable. For he asked what thank wee will give to a bondseruant when having beene all the day travailed with sundrie labors he returneth home to us in the evening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst have required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage hee ought, for hee with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what for their Supererogations are which these men will will boast of to God: for they be tristles, such as hee neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approve them, nor will allowe them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onely we will grant that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place also spoken of these things: Wherefore do ye weye your silver & not in bread? Ye spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is in deed not verie harde for these idle Rabbines to dispute under the shadow in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne judge shal sit in his judgement seat, such windie decrees shal of necessitie vanish away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence wee may bring to his judgment seat, not what we may take of in schooles and corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two pestilences to bee drunned out of our minde; that we put no affiance in the righteouſness of works, and that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The scriptures doe euery where thrust vs from all manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteouſnesses do flinke in the sight of God; vnlesſe they receive a good favoure from the innocencie of Christ, & that they can do nothing but procure the vengeance of God, vnlesſe they be sustaine by the tendereness of his mercy. Moreover they doe leave nothing to vs, but that we should crave the mercie of our judge with that confession of David, that none shall be justified before him, if he require account of his seruants. But where Job saith: If I have done wickedly, woe to mee: but if I doe righteously, yet I will not lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteouſness of God, whereunto the verie Angels answere not: yet hee therewithall sheweth that when they come to the judgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not only to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld than daungroously strive with the rigorousness of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteouſness in himselfe, than such as at the first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is drunned away, al glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteouſness to these works, the affiance whereof trembleth before the sight of God? Wee must therefore come whither Esay calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may be praied & glorie in God: because it is most true which he faith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shal then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in any behalfe rest upon the confidence of workes, nor rejoice in the glorie of them. But this errour encouraged foolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in workes.

17 But if wee looke to the foure kindes of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accord with works in the stablishing of our saluation. For the scripture doth euery where report, that the cause of procuring the eternall life to vs, is the mercie of the heavenly Father and his free loue toward vs: that matteriall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which hee purchased righteouſness for vs. What alfo shall wee say to be the formal or instrumentall cause cause but faith? And these three causes John comprehendeth together in one sentence, when he faith, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten sonne, that every one which believeth in him may not perish, but may have everlastinge life. Nowe the finall cause the Apostile testifieth to be both the shewing of the righteousnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where he rehearseth also the other three in express wordes. For his faith thus to the Romanes, all haue sinned and doe neede the grace of God: but they are justified freely by his grace. Here thou haist the head and firstfontaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: by the redemption which is in Christ Icut. Here thou haist as it were the matter whereof righteousness is made for vs through faith in his bloud. Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousness of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all he ioyneth the ende, when he faith, into the shewing of his righteousness that he may be righteous and the righteousemaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousness standeth of reconciliation) hee setteth expressly by name, that Christ was given to vs for reconciliation. So in the first Chapter also to the Ephesians hee teachegeth that wee are received of God into favour by meere mercie: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: received by faith: all to this ende, that the glory of the godnesse of God may fully shine. When wee see that all the partes of our salvation are so without vs, what cause is there that wee shoulde nowe either have affiance or glorie in worke? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moue any controversie with vs about the efficient or final cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Material and formal cause they calfe a fallace colour, as though our worke haue a halfe place with faith and the righteousnesse of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to vs for righteousness & life, and that this benefite of righteousness is pessessed by only faith.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen and comfort them selues with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbeare not to report of it with praiie, that is done two wayes: either that in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceive thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for compensinge of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust and deservaed condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison of other, while they record themselves before God, the purenesse of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two wayes, we shal see hereafter: nowe lete vs briefly declare of the latter, how it agreez with that which wee haue abovefaide, that in the judgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of worke, and glorie vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stabilishing of their saluation, doe without respect of worke bend their eyes to the onely goodnesse of God. And they doe not onely bend themselves to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but doe rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raisd and
The grace of Christ.

The comfort which righteous men do conceive by the conscience of their integritie is grounded upon the knowledge of righteousnesse which respect of workes.

19 When therefore the holy ones do by innocencie of conscience confirm their faith, and gather matter of rejoicing, they doe nothing but call to mind by the fruities of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lorde into the place of children. This therefore is taught by Solomon, that in the feare of the Lorde is stedfast assurednesse: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they have walked before his face in vprightnesse and simplicite: have no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience; but are then onely of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is nowhere which may stablish a full assurednesse, and the holy ones are priuie in their conscience of such an vprightnesse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnans of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the fruities of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they do thereby not slenderly strengthen themselues to look for the help of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their father in so great a matter. And even this alfo they cannot doe, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodnesse of God, sealed with no other assurednesse, than of the promise. For if they begin to wey it by good workes, nothing shall be more uncertaine nor more weake: forasmuch as if workes be considered by themselves, they shall no leff by their imperfection thewe proofe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoever imperfect purenesse testifie his good will. Finally they do so set out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free favour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, deapth, and height of them: as if he should say: Ephe.3.18. Whither soever the fenes of the godly doe turne themselves, how high soever they clime, how farre & wide soever they extend them, yet they ought not to go out of the loue of Christ, but hold themselves wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehended all kinds of measures in it. And therefore he faith that it excelleth and surmounteth above all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in another place, when he glorifieth that all the godly are vanquishers in battle, he by and by addeth a reason, because Rom.8.37.
of him that loued vs.
20. We see nowe that there is not in the holy ones y' affiance of worke, which either guilteth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the gifts of God, whereby they reknowledge his goodness none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may think upon their election) or which withdraweth any thing fro the free righteouines which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth upon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in fewe words, but verie well set out where he writeth, I do not say to the Lord, despite not the worke of my hands, or I have sought the Lord with my handes and have not beene deceived. But I doe not commende the worke of my hands: for I feare, least when thou haft looked vpon them, thou shalt finde mee sinnes then merites. Only this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despite not the works of thy hands, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest mee: if thou beholdest theine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoever good works I haue, they are of thee. He setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his worke to God, because if he have any good works, he seeth therein nothing his own: secondly, because the same is also overwelmed with multitude of sinnes. Whereupon commeth to passe that the conscience feelth thereby more feare & dismaying than assurednesse. Therefore he would haue God no otherwise to looke on his good doings, than that reknowledgeing in them the grace of his calling, he may make an ende of the worke which he hath begonne.

Rom.8.30.

21. But furthermore whereas the scripture sheweth that the good worke of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doth good to them, that is so to bee understood, that which we have before set may stand vnshaken, that the effect of our saluation consisteth in the love of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the instrument, in the enlightning of the holy ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the ende is the glorie of the greater kindness of God. These things withstand not, but that the Lord may embrace works as inferior causes. But whenceth commeth that? Namely whom the Lord of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinarie dispensation he doth by good works bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this manner he sometime diueth eternal life from worke: not for it is to be ascrib'd to them: but because whom he hath chosen, them he doth justify, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the gracie that goeth before which is a step toward ye which followeth, after a certaine maner the cause of it. But so often as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, hee biddeth vs not to see to worke, but holdeth vs in the onely thinking vpon the mercie of God. For what manner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life everlastig? Why doeth hee not set righteounesse in comparison against sinne, as hee setteth life against death? Why doeth he not make righteounesse the cause of life, as hee maketh sinne the cause of death? For so should the comparison of contraries haue stande wel together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meaneth by this comparison to expresse that which was true, that death is due to the the defervings of men; that life is posed in the only mercy of God. Finally in these manners of speaking is rather expressed the order than the cause; because God in heaping graces upon graces, taketh cause of the first to add the second, so that he may leave nothing undone to the enriching of his servants; and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet hee would have vs alway to looke unto the free election which is the fountaine & beginning of it. For although he loueth the gifts which he daily giueth, in no much as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to hold fast that free acceptance, which alone is able to vphold our soules: as for such gifts of his Spirit as he afterward giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

The xv. Chapter.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merites of worke, do overswowe as well the praise of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednesse of salvation.

Now wee haue declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that because it righteousnesse be vpholden with works, it must needs be and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contained in the onely meric of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in only faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe staye of the matter, least wee be entangled with that general error, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men, for so soone as question is moued of the justification of faith & worke, they flee to those places which seeme to giue to worke some merite in the sight of God: as though the justification of works were fully wonne, if it be ones proved that they be of any value with God. But we have above plainly shewed that the righteousness of works consisteth onely in the perfect keeping of the law. Whereupon followeth that no man is justified by worke, but he that haue climbed vp to the hithest top of perfection cannot be proved guiltie of any offence be it neuer so litle. Therefore it is another & a severall question: Howsoever worke suuificeth not to justifie a man, whether yet do they not deserve fauour with God?

2. First of the name of merite I mustnesse say this aforeside, that whatsoever first applied it to worke of men, compared to the judgement of God, hee did verie ill provide for the purenesse of faith. Truely I doe by my good will abataine from struies about worde, but I would with that this fabrieke had alway bin vsed among Christian writers, that they wold not haue found in their heartes to vse worde strange from the scriptures, which ingennered much offense & no fruite. For whereto I beseech you, was it needfull to haue the name of merite brought in, when the price of good worke might be fitly expressed by another name without offence? But how much offenee that worde containeth in it, is evident with the great hure of the worlde. Surely as it is most proude it can do nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with stroward pride. The olde writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I would to God they had not with the abusing of one little wordes giuen to posteritie matter of errour. Howbeit they themselves also do in many places testify, how in no case they meant to giue any premedice against the truthe. For thus faith Augustine in one place: Let merites of men here hold their peace, which have perisshed by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Jesu Christ. Againe, the sainctes giue nothing to their owne Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercie, O God. In another place, When man seeth that whatsoever good he hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God: he seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his owne merites, but of the mercie of God. You see how taking from men the power of doing well, he also throweth downe the dignity of merite. And chrysfiane faith, Our workes, if there be any, which followe the free calling of God, are repaimet & debt: but the gifts of God are grace & bountifulnesse & the greatnesse of liberal giuing. But leaving the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing I haue veily before alledge a sentence out of Bernard. As it sufficeth to merite, not to presume of Merites: so to want Merites, sufficient to judgement. But by adding forth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnesse of the worde, where he saith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou haft them, know that they are giuen to faire the mercie of God: and so thou haft escaped all daunger, of posteritie, vnthankfulnesse, and presumption. Happie is the church which neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning he vrsed. For of Merites (faith he) why should the church be careful, which hath a sicker, & tender care to glorie of the purpose of God? God cannot denie himselfe, he will do that which he hath promised. If there bee no cause why thou shouldst ask, by what merites may we hope for good things? specially vthou hearest it said, Not for your faues, but for my sake: it sufficeth to merite, to know that merites suffice not.

Eze. 36.22

Our workes shall have reward, they deserve none.

Our workes shall have reward, they deserve none.

3 What all our workes deserve, the Scripture sheweth when it faith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of uncleaneesse: then, what the perfect observing of the law (if any such could be found) shall deserve, when it teacheth that we should thinke our selues vnprofitable seuentuants, when we have done all things that are commaunded vs: because we shall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lord, but onely have performed our due servises, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good workes which hee himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lorde both calleth ours and testifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shall have rewarde. It is our dutie againe for our part, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our heartes, that wee bee not wearied with well doing, and to yelede true thankfulness to so great bountifulnesse of God. It is unoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoever there is in workes that deserveth praife: that there is not one droppe, which wee ought properly to ascribe to our selues. This if wee doe truely and earnestly acknowledge, there shall we haue not onely all affiance but also opinion of Merite. Wee (I say) doe not part the praife of good workes (as the Sophisters doe) betwene God and man: but wee reserve it whole, perfect, and unminished to the Lorde. Onely this wee assigne to man, that even the selue same workes workes that were good hee by his uncleannesse corrupteth and defileth.
For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect soever hee be, that is not defiled with some spotte. Therefore, let the Lord call into judgement when these things that are best in the workes of men: hee shall verily espie in them his owne righteousnesse, but mans dishonestie and shame. Good workes therefore doe please God and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for rewarde the most large benefites of God: not because they doe deserve, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price unto them. But what spitefullnesse is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giveth vndue rewardes to workes that deserve no such thing, doe with ambition full of fa-culledge endeuour further, that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to be rendered to the merites of men. Here I appeale to the common judgement of every man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of grounde by another mans liberall grante, doe also claime to himselfe the title of proprietie: doeth hee not by such unthankfulnesse deferne to loose the verry felie possession which he had? Likewise, if a bond-flaue being made free of his Lord, doe hide the benefite of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a freeman borne: is he not worthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vfe of enjoying a benefite, if wee neither claime to our selues more than is giuen, nor do defraude the author of the benefite of his praise: but rather doe behaue our selues, that which hee hath giuen from himselfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine manner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what manner of moderation is due to God.

4 I knowe that the Sophistiers do abuse certaine places, to prove thereby that the name of Merit toward God is founde in the Scriptures. They allege a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shall make place to every man, according to the Merit of his workes. And out of the Epistle to the He-brues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in refisting the authoritie of Ecclesi-asticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully allege that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoever writer he were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: \vide unicurbi coniecturum, inexcipit et non ait sine dubio erogatur. He shall make place to every mercie, & every man shall finde according to his workes. And this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine tran-slacion, appeareth both by the framing of these worde, & by a longer joy-ing together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrues, there is no cause why they should shewe vs in one little worde, when in the Greeke worde of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices doe please & are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue & beate downe the outrageousnesse of our pride, that we faine not anie worthines to works beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good workes are continually be sprinkled with many filthy spotes, wherewith God may be worthily offended & be angry with vs: so farre is it off, yet they be able to win him to vs, or to prouoke his liberality Testimonies abusing for proof of meriti: whereas the doctrine of scripture doth indeed teach the clean contrary, that our good workes deserve nothing at the hands of God, either in this life or in the life to come.

Cap. 15. Of the manner how to receive.

Yet because he of his tender kindnesse doeth not examine them by extremity of law, he taketh them as if they were most pure; and therefore though without merit, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life & of the life to come. For I do not allow the distinction set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good works deserve the graces that are given vs in this life, and that eternal life is the reward of faith alone. For the Lorde doeth commonly alway set in heaven the reward of labours and the crown of battle. Againe, to give it so to the merit of works, that it be taken away from grace; that the Lorde heapeth vs with graces vspon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ faith that to him that hath, shall be giuen, and that the faithful and good servant which hath shewed himself faithful in fewe things, shall set over many: yet he also sheweth in another place, that the encrease of the faithfull are the gifts of his free goodnes. All ye that this faith (faith he) come to the waters: and ye that have not money, come and buy milke & honey without money and without any exchange. Whosoever therefore is now giuen to the faithfull for helpe of salvation, yea and blestnesse it selfe, is the more liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in those hee testifyeth that hee hath consideration of works: because to testify the greatnes of his loue towards vs, he vouchsaft it to grant such honor not onely to vs, but also to the gifts which he hath giuen vs.

5 If these things had in the ages past beene handeled & disposed in such order as they ought to have beene, there had never arifen so many troubles & diffensions. Paul faith, that in the building of Christian doctrin, wee must keep still that foundation which he had laide among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be laide: and that the same foundation is Iesus Christ. What manner of foundation haue wee in Christ? is it, that hee was to vs the beginning of salvation; that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selues? & hath he but only opened the way, by which we should go forward of our own strength? Not so; but, as he saide a little before, when wee acknowledge him, he is giuen to vs for righteousness. No man therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousness in him: forasmuch as the Apostle faith not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtain righteousness, but that he himselfe might be our righteousness. Namely, that we are choosen in him from eternitie before the making of the world, by no deserving of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death wee are redeemed from the damnation of death, and delivered from destruction; that in him wee are adopted of the heavenly father into children and heires: that by his bloud wee are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him to be kept we are delivered from peril of perishing and of being lost: that being so engrafted in him, wee are already after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdom of God by hope: and yet more: that having obtained such partaking of him, howsoever wee be yet fools in our selues, he is wise for vs before God: howsoever wee be sinners, he is righteousnesse for vs: howsoever wee be unclean, hee is cleanness for vs: howsoever wee bee weak, howsoever vnarmed and lying open in daunger of Sathan, yet ours is the power which is giuen him.

him in heaven and earth, whereby he may tread downe Satan for vs, and breake the gates of hell: howsoever we stil care about with vs the body of death, yet he is life for vs briefly that all his thinges are ours, & we in him haue all things, in our selves nothing. Upon this foundation, I say, it behoueth that we be builded, if we wil encrease into a holy temple to the Lord.

6 But the world hath a long time beene otherwise taught. For there haue beene found out I wot not what moral good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be graven in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that they are all in death which haue not possessed the Sonne. If they be in death, howe should they bring forth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that what soever is done without faith, is finne: as though there may be good fruits of an evil tree. But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherein he may shewe so forth his power? They say that he hath suffered for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of securing: that it is nowe our parte not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of vn godlinesse. Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so stripe him naked of his power, and in a manner tread him under foot? This testimonie is ech where spoken of him, that al they are justified that beleue in him: these fellowes teach, that there commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to every man to justify himselfe. But I would to God they taunted what these sayings meant: that al they have life that have the Sonne of God: that whosoever beleueth, is already passed from death into life, that we are justified by his grace, that we might be made heirs of eternal life, that the faithfull haue Christ abiding in them, by whom they cleauie fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, doe fit with him in heavenly places: that they are transplanted into the kingdom of God, and haue obtained salvation and innumerable other such. For they do not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obtaine righteousness or salvation, but that they are both giue to us. Therefore so soone as thou art by faith engraven into Christ, thou art already made the sonne of God, the heire of heauge, partaker of righteousness, possessor of life, & (that their lies may be better confusted) thou haue not obtained the fir ability to deserve, but euene all the deseruinges of Christ: for they are communicated to thee.

7 So the Sorbonical scholes, the mothers of all errors, haue taken from vs the justification of faith which is the summe of all godliness. They grant verily in worde, that man is justified by formed faith: but this they after ware expound, because good works haue of faith this, that they auail to righteousness: that they seeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, fith without great enuiousnesse it could not be passe over insilence,TOKEN it is so oft repeated of the Scripture. And not yet contented, they doe in the praife of good works pruily steale from God somwhat to give away to man. Because they see that good works little auail to advance man, and that they cannot be properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruits of the grace of God: they pitche them out of the strength of free will, oile forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deed, that the principall cause of them is in grace: but they affirme that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is all merit. And this not only the latter Sophisters do teach, but also their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with these, you may say to be bounde wittted and sober. It was truely a point of maruellous blindnesse, that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth, they saye not with how great carefullnesse that man provided that no piece of the glory of good works were it neuer so litle, should be conveyed to men. Here before where we enrearde of free will, we recited certaine testimonies of his to this purpose, of which sort there are oftentimes founde manie like in his writings, as when he forbidde vs that we should no where boast of our merites, because euene they also are the gifts of God: And when he writeth that all our merite is only of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiencie, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombard was blind at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his disciples, than this word of the Apostle. For where he forbidde Christians al glorying, he adjoineth a reason why it is not lawful to glory: because we are that hand worke of God, created to all good worke, that we should walke in them. Sith therefore there commeth out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate, and our regeneration is whole of God without exception, there is no right why we should claim to our selues one ounce in good worke. Finally whereas they continually call upon good worke, in the meane time they so instruct consciences, that they never dare have assen, that they haue God well pleased and fauourable to their works. But contrariwise we, without making mention of any Merite, doe yet by our doctrine raise vp the courages of the faithfull with singular comfort, when we teach the in their worke they please God, and are undoubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea & also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to faile, vnlesse he do first with assured confidence of mind determine that he shall please God.

Wherefore let vs not suffer our selues to be led so much as one haire breith away from this onely foundation: which being laid, wise builders do afterward well and orderly build vpon it. For if there be need of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in mind, that the sonne of God hath appeare to this ende, that he might destroy the worke of the diuell: that they should not sin which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercy chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthinesse, but all is spoken at once, when it is shewed that Christ wil have such discipules, which forsaking themselues, and taking vp their crosse, doe follow him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the root of aleuils, that he may no more seek those things that are his own. He that hath taken vp his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildnesse. But the example of Christ containeth both these and all other duties of godlines & holinesse. He shewed himselfe obedient to his father, even to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the works of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glory of his father: he gaue his soule for his brethren: he both both did good and wished good to his enemies. If there be need of comfort, these will bring marvellous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made careful: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: we are brought low, but we are not confounded: we are throwne downe, but we do not perish: alwaye bearing about with vs in our body the mortification of Jesus Christ, that the life of Jesus may be manifestly shewed in vs, that if we bee dead with him, we shall also live together with him: if we suffer with him, we shall also reign together with him: that we be as fashioned like to his sufferings, till we attaine to the likeness of his resurrection: For as much as the Father hath predestinate these to be fashioned like the image of his Sonne, whom, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotten among all his brethren: and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall sever vs from the love of God which is in Christ: but rather all things shall turne to vs to good & to salvation. Lo, we do not justification a man by workes before God: but we say, that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a new creature, that they may passe out of the kingdom of sinne into the kingdom of righteousness: & that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are judged as good by the fruities.

A confutacion of the flanders, whereby the Papistes go about to bring shu doctrine in hatred.

With this one worde may the shamelesesse of certaine yngodlie men bee confuted, which flander vs with saying that wee destroye good workes, and doe draw men away from the following of them, when wee say that they are not justified by workes: nor doe deserve salvation: and againe, that wee make too easie a way to righteousness, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiveness of sinnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadye. These flanders (I say) are with that one worde sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly answere to them both. They alledge that by the justification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leave unspeaken, what manner of men be these zealous lovers of good workes which doe so backbit vs. Let them haue licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiously infect the whole worlde with the filthinesse of their life. They faile that they be grieved, that when faith is to gloriously advanced, workes are driven downe out of their place. What if they be more rais'd vp, and stablished? For neither doe we dreame of a faith void of good workes, nor a justification that is without them. This onlie is the difference, that when we confesse that faith and good workes doe necessarily hang together, yet we set justification in faith not in works. For what reason we doe so, we haue in readiness easely to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ vnto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiuereth her whole strength. Why therefore are we justified by faith? because by faith we take holde of the righteousness of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this
Of the manner how to receive

...this thou canst not take holde of, but that thou must also therewithal take hold of sanctification. For he was given to vs, for righteousness, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ justifieth none whom he doeth not also sanctifie. For these benefites are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnseparable knotte, that whom he enlighteneth with his wifedome, him he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth, he justifieth: whom he justifieth, he sanctifieth. But forasmuch as our question is onely of righ-teousnes and sanctifying, let vs stay upon these. We maie put difference be-twene them, yet Christ containeth them both vnseparably in himselfe.
Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousness in Christ? Thou must first pos-sesse Christ: and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must be made parraker of his sanctification: because he cannot be torne in pieces. Sith therefore the Lord doeth grant vs these benefites to be enjoyed none otherwise than in giving himselfe, he giueth them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appeareth howe it is, that we are justified not without workes, and yet not by workes: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby wee are justified, is noe leffe contained sanctification than righteousnesse.

Neither is the affection of vveil-doing hereby coo-

ted in men when they are taught that the good whereby they do, mereth not the reward whereby they shall receive for doing: the scripture hath oothermotions than this vvhich is progested unto good workes.

2 That also is most falle, that the mindes of men are withdrawn from the affection of welloing, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from rewarde to merite, as I shall afterwaids more plainly declare: namely, because they know not this principle, that God is no leffe liberall when he affigneth reward to workes, than when he giueth power to do well. But this I had rather differre to the place fit for it. Now it shalbe enough to touch how weak their objection is: which shalbe don two waies. For first whereas they faie that there shalbe no care of wel framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onlie be entended when men serue God, that they looke to reward or set out to hire or sel their labors to him, they little preuaile: for God will be freely worshipped, freely loued: he (I faie) alloweth that worshipper, which wherall hope of receiuing reward is cut off, yet ceaseth not to worship him.
Moreover, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurres unto them, then those that are taken of the end of our redemption and calling: such as the word of God spueth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked vnhthankfulness, not mutually to loue him againe: which first loued vs: that by the blood of Christ our consciences are cleansed from death workes, to serue the living God: that it is a hainous sacrilege, if being once cleansed, we defile our felues with newe filthinesse, and prophan that hollie blood: that wee are deluered from the handes of our enemies, that wee may without feare serue him in hollinesse and righteousness before him all the dayes of our life: that we are made free from sinne, that we may with a free Spirit, follow righteousness: that our old mam is crucified, that we may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe, that if we be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) we must seek these things that are above, and must in the world be waisfaring men from home, that we emaie long toward heaven where is our treasure: that the grace of

God hath appeared to this end, that for taking away godliness and worldlie desires, we may live soberly, holy, & godly in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of the great God and Saviour; therefore that we are not appointed that we should stirre vp wrath to our selues, but that we may obteine salvation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which it is not lawful to be defiled: that we are not darkness, but light in the Lorde, which must walk as children of light; that we are not called to uncleannesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from unlawful desires: that our calling is holy, that the same is not fulfilled but with purenesse of life: that we are for this purpose delievered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousness. Can we be pricked toward to charitie with anie more lively argument than that of John, that we should mutually love one another as God hath loved us? that wherein his children doe differ from the children of the Diuell, the children of light from the children of darkness, because they abide in love? Againe with that argument of Paul, that we if we cleave to Christ, are the members of one bodie, which it is meet to be holpen one of another with mutual duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holines then when we heare againe of John, that all they that haue this hope, doe sanctifie themselves, because their God is holy? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that having the promise of adoption, we should cleanse our selues from all the desiling of the flesh and spirite? then when we heare Christ setting forth himselfe for an example vnto vs that we should follow his steppes?

3 And these few things I haue set forth for a rable: For if I should entend to goe through all, I should be driven to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to euery good work, & that without anie mention of merite. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this that our salvation standeth vpon the onlie mercie of God and vpon no merite of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of hie for vs but in the righteousnesse of Christ, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, he beseecheth them by that mercie of God which he hath vouchsafed to extende to vs. And truely this one caufe ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs. But if anie be not vehemently mowed with the glorie of God, yet the remembrance of his benefites ought to haue bin most sufficient to stirre vp such men to do well. But these men, which do peraduenture with thrusting in of merites beate out some scruple and constrained obediences of the law, doe fally faie that we haue nothing whereby we may exhort men to good workes, because we go not the same waie to worke. As though God were much delighted with such obediences which protesteth he loueth a cherefull giber, and forbiddest any thing to be gien as it were of heauinesse or necessity. Neither do I speake this for that I doe either refuse or desife that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes vseth, that it maie leave no meane vnattempted euery way to stirre vp our mindes. For it rehearseth the reward which God wil render to euerie man according to
of the maner how to receie to his workes. But I denye that that is the onelie thing, yea or the chiefe among manie. And then I graunte not that we ought to take beginning ther-at. Moreover I affirme that it maketh nothing to the setting vp of such me-rites as these men boast of, as wee shall hereafter see. Last of all I saie that to no profitable vse, vnlesse this doctrine have first taken place, that wee are iustified by the onelie merit of Christ, which is conceied by faith but by no merits of our works, because none can be fit to the endeouor of holices, vnlesse they have first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet very wel signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercie y thou maist be feared. For he tealeth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercie is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded & established. Which is verie worthise to be noted, y wee may know not onlie that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercie, but also that the feare of God (which the Papistes shall have to be meuriorious) cannot have the name of mercie, because it is grovded vpon the pardon and forguenuesse of sinnes.

But it is a most vaine flander, that men are allured to sinne, when wee affirme the free forguenuesse of sinnes, in which we say that righteou-nesse confisiteth For, we saie that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompened, and that therefore it shoulde never bee ob-ained, vnlesse it were freely giuen. Moreover, that it is to vs in deedee freely giuen, but not fo to Christ which bought it fo dearly, namely with his own most holie blood, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be paide to the judgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holie blood is not shed fo oft as they sinne. Furthermore, wee learne, that our filthines is such, as is never washed away but with the fountaine of this most pure bloud. Ought not they that heare these things, to conceive a greater horrore of sinne, than if it were saide that it is wiped away with the sprinkeling of good works? And if they haue anything of God, howe can they but dread being once cleansed, to wallowe themselves againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to trouble and infect the pure-nesse of this fontaine? I haue washed my feete (faith the faithfull foule in Salomon) howe shall I againe defile them NOWE it is evident, whether force doeth both more abase the forguenuesse of sinnes, and do more make vile the dignitie of righteouunessse. They babble that God is appealeed with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their douing: We affirme that the guil-tinerves of sinne is more grieuous than can bee purged with so light trifles:

that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogative of the onelie bloud of Christ. They saie that righteouuiness (if it faile at anie time) is restored and repaired by satisfactorie workes: wee thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with anie recompence of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof wee must flie to the onelie mercie of God. As for the rest of those things that pertaine to the forguenuesse of sinnes, let them be sought out of the nest Chapter.

The
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 264

The xvii. Chapter.
The agreement of the promises of the law and the Gospel.

Now let us also go through the other argumentes wherewith Satan by the souldiers of his garde, goeth about either to overthrowe or batter the justification of faith. This I think we have alreadie wrung from the sclaunryers, that they can no more charge vs as enemies of good works, for justification is taken away from good works, not that no good works should be done, or that those which are done shuld be denied to be good, but that we should not put affection in them, nor glory in them, nor ascribe salvation vnto them. For this is our affection, this is our glory, and the ony author of our salutati, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him the sons of God, and heires of the heavenly kingdom, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they doe beside these affaile vs, as we have saide, with other engines, goe to, let vs go forward in bearing away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the law, which the Lorde did set forth to the keepers of his lawe: and they ask whether we will have them to be utterly yeade or effectuall. Because it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are void, they take it for confesed that they are of some effectuallnesse. Hereupon they reason that we are not justified by only faith. For thus faith the Lord and it shallbe, if thou shalt here these commandementes and judgements, and shall keepe them & do them, he Lord also shallkepe with thee his covenant and mercy which he hath worne to thy fathers, he shall love thee and multiply thee, and blese thee, &c. Againe, If ye shall well direct your waies and your endeavours, if ye walk not after strange Gods, if ye do judgement betweene man and man, and go not backe into malice, I will walke in the middeft of you. I will not recite a thousand peeces of the same sort, which litle they nothing differ in senfe, shallbe declared by the solution of these. In a summe, Moses testifieth that in the law is let forth blessing and curse, death and life. Thas therfore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and fruitelesse, or that justification is not of faith alone. We have already before shewed, howe if we sticke fast in the law, ouer vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth only curse which is threatened to trasgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his law, such as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that al mankind is by the law accused, and subject to curse & the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needs goe out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into liberty from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdrawe vs from the keeping of the law, should allure vs to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staies being broken and with loose reins to run at riot; but the spiritual libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a dismayed and ouerthrown confiencce, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the lawe helde it downe bounde and fast tyed. This deliverance from the subiection of the lawe, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obteaine when by faith wee take holde of the mercie of God.
Cap. 17. Of the manner how to receive

God in Christ, whereby we are certified and assur'd of the righteousness of sinnes, with the feeling whereof the law did pricke and bite vs.

2. By this reason even the promises that were offer'd vs in the law, should be all unseen, and voyde, vnslee the goodnesse of God by the Gospel did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole lawe, upon which the promises hang, and whereby, they are to be performed, shall never be fulfilled. And the Lord so helpeth, not by leaving part of righteousness in our works, and supplying parte by his mercifull bearing with vs, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousness. For the Apostle, when he had before saide that he and other Jews believe in Jesus Christ, knowing that man is not justified by the works of the lawe, addeth a reason: not that they should be holpen to fulnesse of righteousness by the faith of Christ, but by it should be justified not by the works of the lawe. If the faithfull remove from the law into faith, that they may in faith finde righteousness which they see to be absent from the lawe: truly they forfake the righteousness of the lawe. Therefore now let him that lift, amplify the rewarding whiche are saide to be prepared for the keeper of the law, to that the therewithal consider that it commeth to passe by our perversenesse, that we feel no fruit thereof till we have obtained an other righteousness of faith. So David, when he made mention of the rewarding which the Lorde hath prepared for his servants, by and by descendeth to the reknowledging of sinnes, whereby that same rewarding is made voyde. Also in the ix. Psalme, he gloriously setteth forth the benefits of the law, but he by and by crieth out: Who shall understand his faults? Lord cleasne me from my secret faults. This place altogether agreeeth with the place before, where when he had said that all the ways of the Lord are goodnes & truth to them that fear him, he addeth: For thine names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my perversenesse, for it is much. So ought we also to reknowledge, that there is indeed the good will of God set forth vnto vs in the law, if we might deferre it by works, but that the fame never commeth to vs by the deferrung of works.

3. How then are they gien that they should vanish away without fruit? I haue even now already protested that the same is not by meaning. I saie verily that they vster not their effectualnes toward vs, so long as they have respect to the merite of works, and that therefore if they be considered in themselves, they be after a certaine manner abolished. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I haue gien you commandementes, which who so shall do shall live in them, is of no value if we stand still in it, & shall never a whit more profit than if it had not beene gien at all: because it belongeth not even to the most hоліе servants of God, which are al far from the fulfilling of the lawe, but are compassed about with manie transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospel are put in place of them, which do offer free forgiveness of sinnes, they bring to passe that not onlie we our selues be acceptable to God, but that our works also have their thank: & not this only that the Lord accepteth then, but also extendeth to the blessinges which were by covenante due to the keping of the law. I grant therefore, that those thinges which the Lorde hath promised in his law to the followers followers of righteousness and holiness, are rendered to the works of the faithful, but in this rendering the cause is always to be considered that pro-reth grace to works. Now it is that we see that there be three. The first is, God turning away his sight from the works of his servants, which alwadeferre rather reproch than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the only mean of faith reconcileth them to himself without the mean of works. The second, that of his fatherly kindness and tender mercifulnes, he lifteth vp works to so great honour, not weighing the worthines of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiveth the ver-ry same works with pardone, not imputing the imperfection, wherewith they al being defiled should otherwise be rather reckoned among sins than ve-tues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters have bin deceived, which thought they had gaily escaped all absurdities, while they said they works do not of their own inward goodnesse availe to deserving salvation, but by the forme of the covenant, because the Lord hath of his liberality so much esteemed them. But in the mean time they considered not, how farre those works which they would haue to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, yea there went before both justification grounded vpone onely faith, and the forgiveness of sins, by which euery the good works themselves haue neede to be wiped from spots. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberalitie, by which it is brought to passe that the works of faith-full are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

4. These alledge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in the Acts: I finde in trueth that God is not an accepter of persons, but in euery nation he that doth righteousness is acceptable to him, and hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be undoubted, that if man doeth by right endeuours get himselfe the fauour of God, it is not the beneficial gift of God alone that he obtaineth salvation yea that God doth of his mercie helpeth a siner, that he is by works bowed to mercie. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, yea so you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby he may be inclined to mercie, but onely miserie. If therefore it bee certain that man is naked and needie of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and laden with all kinds of euils, when God first receiveth them: for what qualitie, I pray you, shall we see that he is worthy of the heavenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merites, where God to evidently setteth out his free mercifullnesse. For, that which in the same place is saide by the voyce of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lowly wretted, that man by endeuour of good works is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it must needs be that Cornelius was alreadie enlightened with the spirit of wisdom, sicth he was endued with true wisdom, namely with the fear of God, that he was fanctified with the same Spirit, sicth he was a follower of righteousness, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certain fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to have pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it off that he did by his own endeauor prepare

prepare himself to receive it. Truly there cannot one syllable of the Scripture be brought fourth that agreeth not with this doctrine, y there is none other cause for God to accept man unto him, but because he seeth that man should be every way lost, if he be left to himself; but because he will not have him lost, he vouchsafteth him, as a new creature with the gifts of his Spirit. This is that accepting wherein Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allowed of God even in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but love & kiss those good things which he worketh in thee by his Spirit. But this is alway to be remembered, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of works, but in as much as for their cause & for their sake, whatsoever good works he hath given them in encreasing of his liberalitie, he also vouchsafteth to accept. For whence have they good works, but because the Lord, as he hath chosen them for vessels unto honour, s糟糕them with true goldlines? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kind Father tenderly graunteth pardon to those deformities & spots that cleave to them: Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and lovely in whom he seeth the marks & features of his own face. For we have in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in vs. Forasmuch as therefore wheresoever the Lord beholdeth his own face, he both wardlike loveth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause saith, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holines & righteousness pleaseth him, but because the godly being clothed with mortal flesh, are yet sinners, and their good worke are but begonne and favouring of the faultiness of the flesh: hee cannot be favourable neither to those nor to these: vnlesse hee more embrace them in Christ than in themselves. After this manner are these places to be taken, which testifie that GOD is kind and mercifull to the followers of righteousness. Mosis saide to the Israelites, The Lord thy God keepeth covenant, to a thousand generations: which sentence was afterward said of the people for a common manner of speech. So Salomon in his solemn prayer, saith, Lorde God of Israel, which keepeth covenant and mercie to thy seruauntes which walke before thee in their whole heart. The same wordes are also repeated of Nehemia. For, as in all the covenants of his mercie, the Lord likewise on their behalfe required of his seruauntes uprightness and holiness of life, that his goodness should not be made a mockerie, and that no man dwelling with vaine rejoysing by reason thereof should bleffe his owne soule, walking in the meanes time in the peruerse fesse of his owne heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their dutie them that are admitted into the communion of the cove-
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 266

The vortuous actions of faithful men are assurances of their reward, and tokens that they are in the favour of God, but no causes for the written promises, whereof God should favour th. 2. Sam. 23. 1.

covenant: yet nevertheless the covenant itself is both made at the beginning free, & perpetually remaineth such. After this manner David when he glorified that there was rendred to him reward of the cleannesse of his handes, yet omitting not that fountain which I have spoken of, that he was drawn out of the womb, because God loved him, where he sobereth out the goodness of his cause, that he abateth nothing from the free mercy which goeth before all gifts, whereof it is the beginning.

And here by the way it shall be profitable to touch what these forms of speaking do differ from the promises of the law. I call promises of the law, not those which are echewhere commonly written in the booke of Moses: (for as much as in them also are found many promises of the Gospel) but those which properly belong to the ministration of the law. Such promises, by what name soever you list to call them, do declare that there is reward ready upon condition, if thou do that which is commanded thee. But when it is said, that the Lord keepeth the covenant of mercie to them which love him, therein is rather shewed what manner of men be his seruants which haue faithfully received his covenant, than the cause is expressed why the Lord should doe good to them. Nowe this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouchsaith to grant vs the grace of eternall life, to this end that he should be loved, feared, and honored of vs: so whatsoever promises there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this end that we should reverence and worship the author of the benefits. So oft therefore as we hear that he doth good to them that keepe his law, let vs remember that the children of God are there signified by the dutie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cause adopted, that we should honour him for our Father. Therefore least we shoulde disherre our selves from the right adoption, we must alwaye endeavour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let vs againe keepe this in minde, that the accomplishment of the mercie of God hangeth not vp the works of the faithful: but that he therefore fulfillleth the promise of salvation to them which auerswore to their calling in uprightness of life, because in them he acknowledgeth the natural tokens of his children which are ruled with his spirit unto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Psalme spoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lorde which shall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who shall rest in thy holy hill: The innocent in handes and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Esaie, Who shall dwell with devouring fire? He that doth righteousnesse, he that speaketh right thinges, &c. For there is not described the stay wherupon the faithful may stand before the Lorde, but the manner wherewith the most mercifull father bringeth them into his felowship, and therein defendeth and strengtheneth them. For, because he abhorreth sinne, he loveth righteousnesse: who heijoyneth to himselfe, them he cleaneth with his spirit, that he may make them of like fashion to himselfe and his kingdom. Therefore if the question bee of the first cause whereby the entrie is made open to the holy ones into the kingdom of God, from whence they haue that they may stand fast & abide in it, we haue this auerswre ready, because the Lorde by his mercie both hath once adopted the, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the questi-

Psa. 10. 6. 30.

Luk. 1. 6.

Of the manner, then we must come down to regeneration & the fruits thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalm.

But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good workes with the title of righteousness, and affirme that man is justified by them. Of the first sorte there be verie manie places, where the obseruings of the commandements are called justifications or righteousnesses. Of the other fort, that is an example which is in Moses. This shalbe our righteousness, if we keepe all these commandements. And if thou take exception & faie that this is a prome of the law, which being knit to a condition impossible, prooueth nothing. There be other of which you can not make the same aunfwere, as this: And that shalbe to thee for righteousness before the Lord, to redeliver to the poore man his pledge, &c. Againe, that which the Prophet saith, that the zeale in reuenging the name of Israel, was imputed to Phinees for righteousness. Therefore the Pharisees of our time thinke that here they have a large matter to triumpha upon. For when we saie, that when the righteousness of faith is set vp, the justifieation of workes giuen place, by the fame right they make this argument: if righteousness be of workes, then it is false that we are justified by faith onely. Though I graunt that the commandements of the lawe are called righteousnesses: it is no maruell: for they are so indeede. Howe be it wee must warn the readers that the Greciues have not falsly translated the Hebrew word Ἰσραήλ, דיקאיא, righteousnesses for commandements. But for the wordes, I willingly release my quarell. For neither doe we deny this to the lawe of GOD, that it containeth perfet righteousness. For although, because we are debtors of all the things that it commandeth, therefore eu'n when we have performed full obedience thereof, wee are vnprofitable servants; yet because the Lord vouchsaied to graunt it the honour of righteousness, we take not away that which he hath giuen. Therefore wee willingly confess that the full obedience of the lawe is righteousness, that the keeping of euery commandement, is a parte of righteousness, if so be that the whole name of righteousness were had in the other partes also. But we deny that there is anie where anie such forme of righteousness. And therefore we take away the righteousness of the law, not for that it is maimed and vnperfect of itselfe, but for that by reason of the weakness of our flesh it is nowhere seene. But the Scripture not onely calleth simply the commandements of the Lord, righteousnesses, but it also giueth this name to the workes of the holy ones. As when it reporteth that Zacharie and his wife walked in the righteousnesses of the Lord, truely when it (to speake) it weighth workes rather by the nature of the law, than by their own proper state. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I euen now faide, that of the negligence of the Greke translator is not a lawe to be made. But as much as Luke woulde alter nothing in the received translation, I wil also not strive about it. For God hath commended these thinges that are in the law to men for righteousness, but this righteousness we performe not but in keeping the whole lawe: for by euerie transgression it is broken. Whereas therefore the lawe doth nothing but prescribe righteousness: if we have have respect to it, all the severall commandements thereof are righteousnesse; if we have respect to men of whom they are done, they do not obtaine the praise of righteousness by one worke, being trespassers in many, and by that same worke which is euer partly faultie, by reason of imperfection.

8 But nowe I come to the second kinde, in which is the chief hardnesse. Paul hath nothing more strong to prove the righteousness of faith, than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness. Sith therefore it is saide that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteousness; what Paul affirmeth of faith, the same may we also conclude of workes. Whereupon our aduersaries, as though they had wonne the victorie, determine that we are indecd not justified without faith, but that wee are also not justified by it alone, and that workes accomplish our righteousness. Therefore here I beseech the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteousness is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously & earnestly weigh with me, howe the Scripture may without caullions be rightly made to agree with itself. For as much as Paul knewe that the justification of faith is the refuge for them that are destitute of their owne righteousness, he doeth boldly conclude that all they that are justified by faith, are excluded from the righteousness of workes. But Sith it is certaine that the justification of faith is common to all the faithful, he doth thereof with like boldnesse conclude that no man is justified by workes, but rather contrariwise that men are justified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to dispute of what value workes are by themselves, and another thing what account is to be made of them after the Stablisshing of the righteousness of faith. If wee shall set a price upon workes according to their worthinesse, we saie that they are unworthy to come into the sight of God: and therefore that man hath no workes whereof he may glorie before God: then, that being spoyled of all help of workes he is justified by onely faith. Nowe we define righteousness thus, that a sinner being received into the communion of Christ is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his blood he obtayneth forgiveness of sinnes, & being clothed with his righteousness as with his owne, he standeth assured before the heavenly judgement seat. When the forgiveness of sinnes is set before, the good workes which followe haue nowe another valuation than after their owne deserving: because whatsoeuer is in them vnperfect, is covered with the perfection of Christ; whatsoeuer spots or filthiness there is, it is wiped away with his cleanness, that it may not prevent the examination of the judgement of God. Therefore when the guiltines of all trespasses is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to defile good workes: the good workes which the faithfull doe are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousness.

9 Now if any man object this against me to affaile the righteousness of faith, first I will aske whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holie workes, being in the rest of the workes of his life a trespasser of the law.
Cap. 17. Of the manner how to receive lawe. This is more than an absurditie. Then I will ask if he be counted righteous for manie good workes, if he be in any part founde guilte. This also he shall not be so bolde to affirme, when the penal ordinance of the lawe crieth out against it, and proclimateth all them accused which have not fulfilled all the commandements of the lawe to the uttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and ask, whether there be anie workes that deserveth to be accused of no vnclenieffe or imperfection. And howe could there be any such before thole eyes, to whom even the very staires are not cleane enough, nor the Angell righteous enough? So shal bee compelled to grant that there is no good work which is not so defiled with transgressions asigned with it, and with the corruptnesse of it selfe, that it can not have the honour of righteousnesse. Nowe if it be certaine that it procedeth from the righteousnesse of faith that workes which are otherwise vnpure, vnclenie, and but halfe workes, not worthie of the sight of God, much lesse of his love, are imputed to righteousnesse, why do they with boastings of the righteousnesse of workes destroie the justification of faith, whereas if this justification were not, they shoulde in vaine boast of that righteousnesse? Will they make a vipers birth? For thereto tend the saying of the vngodlie men. They cannot deny that the justification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousnesse of workes: yet they conclude that man is not justified by faith, because good workes also are accounted for righteousnesse. Therefore let vs passe these follies and confesse as the truth is, that if the righteousnesse of workes of what sort soever it bee accounted, hangeth upon the justification of faith, it is by this not onelie nothing minished but also confirmed, namely whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mightie. Neither yet let vs thinke that workes are so commended after free justification, that they also afterward come into the place of justifying a man, or doe parte the office betwecne them and faith. For vnlesse the justification remaine alway whole, the vnclenieffe of workes shall be vncouered. And it is no absurditie, that a man is so justified by faith that not only he himselfe is righteous, but also his works are esteemed righteous above their worthines.

10 After this manner we will grant in workes not onely a righteousnesse in parte (as our aduersaries themselues would haue) but also that it is allowed of God as if it were a perfect & ful righteousnes. But if we remember againe upon what foundation it is upholden, al the difficultie shal be dissolved. For then and not till then it beginneth to bee an acceptable worke, when it is receiued with pardon. Nowe whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both vs and all our things in Christ? Therefore as we, when we are grafted into Christ, doe therefore appeare righteous before God, because our wickednesse is covered with his innocencie, so our works are & be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultinnesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleanesse of Christ, it is not imputed. So we may rightfully say, that by onely faith not onely we but also our works are justified. Nowe if this righteousnesse of workes of what sort soever it bee, hangeth upon faith and free justification, and is made of it it ought to bee included.

ded under it, and to be severed as the effect under the cause thereof, as I may so call it. So farre is it off that it ought to be raised vp either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to drive men to confess that our blessedness consisteth of the mercie of God, not of works, chiefly enforceth that saying of David, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forguien, and whose sinnes are covered. Blessed is he to whom the Lord hath not imputed sinn.' If any man do thrust into the contrarie innumerable sayings wherein blessedness: seemeth to be given to workes, as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pitie on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsel of the wicked which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe judgement; y endeavle, the poore in Spirit, y meek, the mercifull, &c. they shall not make but that it shalbe true which Paul saith, For because those things that are there commended are never so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is always miserable, vnlesse he be delivered from miserie by forgiveness of sinnes. Forasmuch as therefore all the kindes of blessedness which are extolled in the Scriptures, do fall downe void, so that man receiued fruite of none of them, till he have obtained blessedness by forgiveness of sinnes, which may after ward make place for them: it followeth that this is not onely the highest and the chiefe but also the onely blessedness vnlesse peraduenture you wil have that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Nowe there is much leffe reason why the calling of men righteous should trouble vs, which is commonly given to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holinesse of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeavour to the fol lowing of righteousnes: than does full righteousnes: itselfe, it is meete that this righteousnes: such as it is, give place to the justification of faith, if it hath that which it is.

But they say that wee have yet more businesse with James, namely which with open voice fighteth against vs. For he teacheth both that Abraham was justified by works, and also that all we are justified by works, not by faith only. What then? will they drawe Paul to fight with James? If they hold James for a minister of Christ, his saying must be so taken that it disagree not from Christ speaking by the mouth of Paul. The holy Ghost affirm-eth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteousnes by faith, not by works: and we also do teache that all are justified by faith without the works of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by James that both Abraham's righteousnes and ours consisteth of works, not of only faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himself. What agreement shal there be the fore of these two? It is enough for the aduersaries, if they pluck the righteousnes of faith which we would have to bee fastened with moste deepe roots; but to render to consciences their quietnesse, they have no great care. Whereby verily you may fee that they gnawe the justification of faith, but in the mean time doe appoint no marke of righteousnes where consciencs may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they lift, so that they may boaste of no other victorie than that they have taken away all certain-tie of righteousnes. And this wretched victorie they shall obtaine, where the light of truthe being quenched, the Lord shall suffer them to over-spread the darkness of lies. But wherefore the truth of God shall stand, they shall nothing prevail. I deny therefore that the saying of James which they still continually hold vp against us as it were, the shield of Achilles doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plain, first wee must looke at the marke that the Apostle shooteth at: and then wee must note where they be deceived. Because there were then manie (which mischiefe is wont to be continual in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelity, In neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithful, and yet ceased not to boast of the fale name of faith: James doeth here mock the foolish boldnes of such men. Therefore it is not his purpose in any point to diminish the force of true faith, but to shewe how fondly those triflers did challenge so much the vaine image of it, that being contented here with they carelessly ranne diuolutely abrode into all licentiousnes of vices. This ground being conceiued, it shall be easie to perceiue where our adversaries doe misse. For they fall into two deccites in the word, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of justifying. Whereas the Apostle nameth faith a vaine opinion farre distant from the truth of faith, it is spoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter; which he sheweth at the beginning in these wordes. What profeth it, my brethren, if any man say he hath faith, & hath no works? He doth not say, if any haue faith without works, but, If any man boast. More plainly also he speaketh a little after, where he in merrer maketh it worse than the diuels knowledge. last of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may sufficiently perceiue what he meaneth. Thou beleeueth (faith he) that there is a God. Truely if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleue that there is a God, it is now no manuell if it doe not justifie. And when this is taken from it, let vs not thinke that anye thing is abated from the Christian faith, the nature whereof is farre otherwise. For after what maner doeth true faith justifie vs, but when it conioyneth vs with Christ, that being made one with him wee may enjoy the partaking of his righteousness? It doth not therefore justifie vs by this that it conceiuieth a knowledge of the being of God, but by that it refeth upon the assurednes of the mercy of God.

12. We have not yet the worke, vnlesse we examine also the other deceit in the word, forasmuch as James setteth part of justifying in works. If you will make James agreeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, & with himself, you must of necessitie take the worde of justifying in another signification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul faith that we are justified, when the remembrance of our vngistowness being blotted out, wee are accounted righteous. If James had meant of that taking, he had wrongfull alleged that out of Moses: Abraham beleued God, &c. For he thus frameth it together. Abraham by worke obtained righteousnes, because he stended not at ? commandement of God, to offer vp his fonne. And so the scripture was fulfilled, which faith, that he beleued God, & it was imputed to him for righteousness. If it be an absurditie, that the effect is before his cause, either Moses doeth in that place falsely testify, that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness, or he deserted not righteousnes by that obedience which he shewed in offering vp of Isaac. Abraham was justifie by his faith, when Ismael was not yet conceived, which was now grown past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore that we say, that he got to himselfe righteousness by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either James did wrongfully mistake the order (which it is a wickednesse to think) or he meant not to say that he was justified, as though he deferred to be accounted righteous. How then? Truly it appeareth that he speaketh of the declaration of righteousness & not the imputation: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith, they do proue their righteousness with obedience & good works, not with a bare & imagelike visor of faith. In a summe, he disputeth not by what meane we are justified, but he requireth of the faithful a working righteousness. And as Paul affirmeth that men be justified without the help of works: so James doeth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good works. The considering of this end, shall deliver vs out of all doubt. For our aduersaries are hereby chiefly deceived, that they think that James defineth the manner of justifying, whereas hee traualleth about nothing else but to overthrowe their peruerse carelesness, which did vainly pretend faith to excuse their defiling of good works. Therefore into how many wyes soever they wrest the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodilie shewe of faith doth not justify, and that a faithful man not contented with such an imaginative shewe, doth declare his righteousness by good works.

13 As for that which they allege out of Paul, the same meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers, are justified, it nothing helpeth them, I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrofes, that that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the law is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a meere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Jewes from foolish confidence, which boasted themselves of the onely knowledge of the lawe, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the lawe, he warneth them, that if righteousnesse were sought out of the lawe, not the knowledge but the observing of it is required. We verily make no doubt of this that the righteousness of the law standeth in works: nor yet of this also, that the righteousnesse consisteth in the worthines and merits of works: but it is not yet proved, that we are justified by works, vnlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the lawe. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging together of the text shall be a sufficient testimonie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Jewes of unrighteousnesse, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and faith, that they which sinned without the lawe, doe perish without the lawe: which is spoken of the Gentiles: but they which have sinned in the lawe, are judged by the lawe: which pertaineth to the Jewes. Nowe because they winking at their owne trespassings proudly gloried of the onely lawe: he adiouneth that which most fitly agreed, that the lawe was not therefore made, that men should bee made righteous by onely hearing of the voice thereof: but then and not till then when they obeyed, as if he should saye: Seekest thou righteousnes in the lawe: allege not the hearing of it, which of it self is of small importance, but bring works, by which thou maist declare that the law was not set for thee in vaine. Of these works because they were all defective, it followed that they were spoiled of glorying of the law. Therefore we must of the meaning of Paul, rather frame a contrarie argument.

The righteousnesse of the lawe consisteth in the perfection of works. No man can boast that he hath by works satisfied the lawe. Therefore there is no righteousnes by the lawe.

Nowe they alledge also these places, wherein the faithful do boldly offer their righteousnes to the judgiment of God to be examined, & require that sentence be given of them according to it. Of which sort are these: Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousnesse, & according to my innocencie, which are in me. Againe, Hear my righteousnesse, O Lord; thou hast proved my heart, & hast visited it in the night, & there was no wickednesse found in me. Againe, The Lord shall render to me, according to my righteousnesse, & shall recompence me according to the cleanness of my hands. Because I have kept the ways of the Lord, & have not wickedly departed from my God. And I shall be vnsotted, & shall keepe me from my iniquity. Againe, Judge me, O Lord, because I have walked in mine innocencie; I have not consented with lying men, I will not enter in with them that do wicked things. Destroy not my soul with the vngodly, my life with me of bloud. If I have walked innocently, I have about me a borrower of the affiance which the holy ones do seeme to take to the justification of works. As for these testimonies that we have here alleged, they shall not much accombred them if they be understood according to their compass, or (as they commonly call it) their circumstanc. Now the same is double. For neither would they have them to be wholly examined that they should be either condemned or acquited according to a continual course of their whole life: but they bring into judgment a speciall cause to be debated. Neither do they claim to themselves righteousnesse in respect of the perfection of God, but by comparison of naughty & wicked men. First when the justifying of man is entreated of, it is not onely required that he have a good cause in some particular matter, but a certain perpetual agreement of righteousnesse in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call upon the judgement of God to approve their innocencie, do not offer themselfes free from al guiltines & in every behalfe faultless; but verily when they have fastened their affiance of salvation in his goodness only, yet trusting that he is the reveauer of the poor afflicted against right & equity, they commend to him the cause wherein the innocencons are oppressed. But when they set their adversaries with them before the judgement of God, they boast not of such an innocencie as that answere to the purenes of God, if it be severally searched, but because in comparison of the malice, obstinacie, vurtue & wickednes of their adversaries, they knowe that their plainnesse, righteousnesse, simplicitie, & cleanness is knowne & pleasing to God; they feare not to call upon him to be judge betweene themselfes & them. So when David said to Saul: The Lord render to every man according to his righteousnesse & truth, he meant not that the Lord shall examine by himselfe and reward every man according to his deservings, but he tooke the Lord to witnesse, how great his innocencie was in comparison of the wickednes of Saule. And Paul himselfe, when he boaste with this glorifying that he hath a good witness of conscience, that he hath travailed with simplicity and vprightnesse in the Church of God, meaneth not that he standeth upon such glorifying before God, but being compelled with the flanders of the wicked, he defendeth his faithful and honest dealing, which he knewe to be pleasing to the mercifull kindnesse of God, against all euill speaking of men whatsoever it be. For wee see what hee saith in another place, that he knoweth no euill by himsels, but that he is not thereby justified, namely because he knewe that the judgement of God far furbounteth the blearied sight of men. Howsoever therefore the godly doe defend their innocencie against the hypocriſfe of the vngodly, by the witnessing & judgement of God; yet when they haue to do with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquitie, Lord, Lord who shall abide it? Enter not into judgement with thy seruants: because every one that liueth shall not be justified in thy sight: and distrusting their owne worke, they gladly sing: Thy goodnesse is better then life.

15 There are also other places not unlike to these before, in which a man may yet tary. Solomon faith, that he which walketh in his vprightnesse, is righteous. Again, That in the path of righteousness is life, and that in the same is not death. After which manner Ezekiel reporteth that he shall liue life that doth judgement and rightouſnes. None of these doe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sons of Adam with such an vprightnesse. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the sanctuary of mercy. Neither doe we in the mean time deny but that to the faithfull their vprightnes, though it be but halfe & vnperfected, is a step towards immortalitie. But whence commeth that but because whom the Lord hath taken into the covenante of grace, he searcheth not their works according to their desertings, but kisseth them with fatherly kindnesse? Wherby we do not only understand that which the scholemen doe teach, that workes haue their value of the accepting grace. For they mean that workes which are otherwise insufficient to purchase rightouſnes by the covenante of the lawe, are by the accepting of God auauenced to the value of equalitie. But I say that they being defiled both with other trespassings & with their owne spottes, are of no other value at all, then as much as the Lord tenderlie granteth pardon to both: that is to say, giueth free rightouſnes to man. Neither are here those prayers of the Apostle reasonable in place, where he wifheth so great perfection to the faithfull, that they may be faultles & inblamable in the day of the Lord. These wordes in ddee the Celestines did in old time turmoil, to affirm an perfection of rightouſnes in this life. But, which we thinke to be sufficient, wee answer breuiſe after Augustine, that all the godlie ought in ddee to endeavoure toward this marke, that they may one day appeare spotles and faultles before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forwarde, wee shall then and not till then attaine to this marke, when being unclothed of this flesh of sinne, we shall fully cleaue to the Lorde. Yet will I not stifflie strive with him which will giue
give the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that he also limiteth the same with the words of Augustine himselfe. When (faith he) we will call the ver-tue of the holy ones, perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in truth and in humilitie.

The xviii. Chapter.
That of the rewards, the righteousness of workes is still gathered.

Nowe let vs passe ouer to those sayings which affirme, that God will render to every man according to his workes: of which sort are these. Eue-ry man shall beare away that which he hath done in the body, either good or euill. Glorie and honour to him that worketh good: trouble and distresse upon every soule of him that worketh euill. And they which have done good things, shall goe into the resurrection of life: they which have done euill, into the resurrection of judgement. Come yee blessed of my father: I haue hungered, and yee gaue me meate; I haue thirsted, and yee gaue me drinke: &c. And with them let vs also ioyne these sayings, which call eternall life the reward of workes. Of which sort are these. The rendring of y hands of a man shall be restored to him. He that feareth the commandement, shall be rewarded. Be glad and reioyce, behold, your reward is plentiful in heavuen. Every man shall receive reward according to his labor. Where it is faid that God shall render to every man according to his workes, the same is easifely ashyed. For that manner of speaking doeth rather shew the order of following, then the cause. But it is out of dout, that the Lorde doeth accomplish our saluation by these degrees of his mercie, when those whom he hath choosen hee calleth to him: those whom hee hath called, he iustifieth: those whom he hath iustified, he glorifieth. Although therefore he doth by his only mercie receiue them y be his into life, yet because he bringeth them into the possession thereof by the race of good workes, that he may fulfill his workes in them by such order as he hath appointed: it is no maruie if it bee saide that they be crowned according to their workes, by which without doubt they are prepared to receiue the crowne of immortalitie. Yea and after this maner it is fayde that they worke their owne saluation, when in applying themselves to good workes, they praftice themselvese towards eternall life: namely as in another place they are commanded to worke the meate which periseth not, when by beleeuing in Christ they get to the selues life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the sonne of man shall gie you. Whereby appareareth y the worde of Working is not set as contrarie to grace, but is referred to endeuour: and therefore it followeth not, y either y faithful are themselves authors of their owne saluation, or that the fame procceedeth from their workes. How then? So soone as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by the knowledge of the Gospel, and the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternall life is begun in them. Now the same good worke which God hath begun in them, must also bee made perfect vntill the day of the Lord Iesu. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heavenly fa-thor in righteousness and holines, they prove themselves to bee his children not swarued out of kinde.

2 There is no cause why we should of the name of rewarde gather an argument that our workes are the cause of salvation. First let this be determined in our hearts, that the kingdom of heaven is not a reward of servants, but an inheritance of children, which they only shall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to be his children: & for no other cause, but for this adoption. For the sonne of the bond woman shall not be heare, but the sonne of the free woman. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghost promiseth to workes eternal glorie for reward, in expressing the inheritance by name, he sheweth that it commeth from else where: So Christ rehearseth works, which he recompenseth with the rewarding of heaven, when he calleth the elect to the possession thereof: but he therewithal adoineth that it must be possest by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth servants, which doe their dutie faithfully, to hope for reward of the Lord: but he addeth of inheritance. We see how they do as it were by express words prouide that we impute not eternal blessednes to works, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore doe they therewithal together make mention of workes? This question shalbe made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Isace, there was promised to Abraham a seed in which all the nations of the earth should be blest: and a multiplying of his seede, which should match the starrs of the skie, & the lands of the sea, & other like. In many yeres afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer vp his sonne in sacrifice. When hee had performed this obedience, hee received a promise: I have sworne by my selfe (faith the Lorde) because thou haft done this thing, & haft not spared thine owne only begotten sonne, I will bleffe thee & multiply thy seede as the starrs of the skie, and the lands of the sea: thy seede shall possesse the gates of their enemies, & al the nations of the earth shall be blest in thy seede, because thou haft obeyed my voice. What heare wee? Hath Abraham by his obedience deserued the blessing? the promise were of he had receiv'd before that the commandement was giuen? Here verily we have it without circumstances shewed, that the Lorde rewarded the works of the faithfull with those benefites which hee had alreadie giuen them before that the works were thouht of, hauing yet no cause why hee should do good to them but his owne mercie.

3 Yet doth the Lord not deceuie nor mock vs when he faith that he rendreth for reward to workes the same thing which he had before works freely giuen. For, because he wil haue vs to be exercised with good works, to think upon the delivery or enjoying (as I may so call it) of these things which he hath promised, and to runne through them to the blessed hope set before vs in heaven, the fruit of the promises is also rightly assigned to them, to the ripeness whereof they do not bring vs. The Apostle very fitly expressed both these points, when he said that the Colossians apply themselves to the duties of charitie, for the hope which is laide vp for them in heaven, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospel. For when he saith that they knewe by the Gospel, that there was hope lay'd vp for them in heaven, he declareth that the same is by Christ only, not vnderprapped with any workes. Where with accordeth that saying of Peter, that the godly... godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, into the salvation which is ready to be manifestly shewed at the time appointed for it. When he faith they labour for it, he signifieth that the faithful must run all the time of their life, that they may attain to it. But least we should thinke that the reward which the Lord promised vs, is reduced to the measure of merit, he did put forth a parable, in which he made himself a householder, which sent all them that he met, to the trimming of his vineyard, som at the first hour of the day, some at the second, some at the thirde, yea & some also at the 11. At euening he payde to euery one equall wages. The exposition of which parable, that same old writer whatsoever he was, whose booke is carried abroad under the name of Ambrose of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly & truly set out. I wil vse rather his words than mine own. The Lord (faith hee) by the rule of this comparison hath established the diversitie of many-fold calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyard at the 11. hour, are made equall with them that had wrought the whole day, do represt the eftate of them, whose for the aduauncing of the excellency of grace, the tender kindnesse of the Lorde hath rewarded at the waning of the day, & at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labor, but pouring out the riches of his goodnes vp to them whom he hath chosen without works, that euery one which have swet in great labour, & have receiued no more than the last, may understand that they have receiued a gift of grace, not a reward of works. Last of all, this also is worthie to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the rewarde of works, that it is not simply taken for the communicating which wee haue with God to blessed immortallitie, when hee embraceth vs with fatherly good wil in Christ: but for the possesseing or enjoying {as they call it) of blessednes, as also the very wordes of Christ doe shewe, in time to come life everlafting. And in another place, Come & possesse the kingdom, &c. After this manner Paul calleth adoption, the revealeing of the adoption which shalbe made in the resurrection: & afterward expoundeth the redemption of our bodie. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternall death, so when man is receiued of God into fauour, that he may enjoy the communicacion of him & be made one with him, he is receiued from death to life: which is done by the beneficall meane of adoption only. And if, as they are wont, they stily enforce the reward of workes, wee may turne against them that saying of Peter, that eternall life is the reward of faith.

4 Therefore let vs not thinke that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthines of our workes, as if they deservd such reward. For the Scripture teacheth nothing to vs, whereof wee may be aduanced in the sight of God. But rather it wholly endeoureth to beat downe our arrogancie, to humble vs, to throw vs downe, & altogether to break vs in pecces. But our weakness is so succoured, which otherwise woulde by and by slippe & fall downe, vnlesse it did suffice it selfe with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious griefes with comfort. First how hard it is for a man to for-sake and deny not only all his things, but also himself, let every man consider for himself. And yet with this introduction Christ traineth his scholers, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he doth instructeth them under, the the discipline of the cross, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or confidence of present good things. Briefly hee so handleth them for the most part, that which way soever they turne their cies throughout the whole widenesse of the world, they have on euery side nothing but desparation present before them, so that Paul faith, that we are more miserable than all men if our hope be only in this world. That they should not faint in these so great distresses, the Lord is present with them, which putteth the in mind to lift vp their head higher, to cast their cies further, that they find with him the blessednesse which they see not in the world. This blessednes he calleth, reward, wages, recompence, not weying the merit of workes, but signifying that it is a recompensing to their troubles, sufferings, flanders, &c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but that we may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a rewarding, because in it the Lord receueth his fr6 labors into rest, from affliction into prosperus and happy state, from sorrow into gladnes, from poertie into flowing wealth, from flame into glorie, and changeth all the evils which they have suffered for greater good things. So it shall also be no inconueniency, if we think holinesse of life to be a way; not which openeth an entrie into the glorie of the heavenly kingdom, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the discloving of it: forasmuch as this is his good wil to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. Onely let vs not imagine a corrélation of merit & reward, wherein the Sophisters do fondly sticke fast, because they consider not this end which wee set forth. But how vnorderly is it, when the Lord calleth vs to one ende, for vs to looke to another? Nothing is more evident, than that reward is promised to good works, to relieue the weaknesse of our fleche with some comfort, not to puffe vp our mindes with glorie. Whosoever therefore doeth thereby gather the merite of workes, or doeth in one balance wey worke with reward, he erreth farre from the right marke of God.

5 Wherefore when the Scripture faith that God the iust judge will one day render to his a crowne of righteousness, I do not onely take exception with Augustine, and fay: To whome should he being a iust judge, render a crowne, if he had not being a mericfull father giuen grace? and how shoulde there be righteousnes, vnlesse grace went before which iustifieth the vnrighteous? Howe shoulde these due thinges bee rendered, vnlesse these vndue things were first giuen? But also I add another thing. How should he impute righteousnesses to our workes, vnles he teder mericulines did hide the vnrighteousnesse that is in them? Howe should he iudge them worthie of rewarde, vnles he did by immeasurable bountifulnes take away that which is worthie of punishment? For he is wond to call eternall life, grace: because it is rendered to the free giiftes of God when it is repaid to workes. But the Scripture doth further humble vs, and therewithall raise vs vp. For besides this that it forbiddeth vs to glorie in workes, because they are the free giiftes of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alwaies defiled with some dregs, that they cannot satisfy GOD, if they bee examined by the rule of his judgement: but least our courage should faint, it teacheth that they please by only pardon. But although Augustine speake how somewhat otherwise than we doe: yet that he doth not so disagree in the matter, shall appeare by his Godes a iust judge shall render a crowne to our righteousness but not vnles he do first graunt vs to our unrighteousnes a gracion pardon. 2.Tim.4.8. Cap. 18. Of the manner how to receive his words in his thirde booke to Boniface. Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life euen miraculously holy and perfect, the other honelt in deede and of vncorrupt maners, but not so perfect but that much wanteth in him, at the last he conclude thus. Even this man which in maners seemeth much inferior, by reason of the true faith in God whereas of he liueth and according to which he accuseth himself in all his offences, in all his good works praisest God, gowing to himselfe the shame, and to him glory, and taking from himselfe both the pardon of sinnes, and the love of welldoings, when he is to be delivered out of this life, hee passeth into the fellowship of Christ. Wherefore, but because of faith 6 Which although it faueth no man without works, (for it is it, which worketh by loue, nor a reprobate faith) yet by it also sinnes are released, because the righteous man liueth of faith: but without it euen the same which seeme good works are turned into sinnes. Here vextly he doth plainly confesseth that which we so much travaile to proue, that the righteousnesse of good works hangeth herupon, that they are by pardon allowed of God.

By seruing God we doe eternallie enrich our selues, not that our service is vowysh as much as once to be regarded, but that his mercie suffeth not his service to loose their labors.

Luk. 16. 9, 1. Tim. 6. 17.

6 A verie neere sense to the places aboue recited, haue thesee: Make to your selues frindes of the Mammon of wickednes, that when you shall talle, they may receive you into everlafting tabernacles Command the rich men of this world not to be prouudly minded, nor to trust in vncertaine riches but in the living God, to doe well, to become rich in good workes, to lay vp in store for themselues a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good workes are compared to the richesse, which wee may enjoy in the blessednes of eternall life. I answereth, that wee shall never come to the true understanding of them, vnlesse wee turne our eyes to the marke wherunto the holy ghost directeth his words. If it be true which Christ faith that our mind abideth there where our treasure is, as the children of the world are wont to bee earnestly bent to the getting of those things which areue for the delights of this present life: so faithfull must look sith they haue learned that this life shall by & by vanish away like a dreame, that they lend those things which they would enjoy, lither where they shall haue perfect life. Wee must therefore doe as they doe, which purpose to remoue into any place, where they have chosen to rest their whole life. They send their goods before, and doe not miscontentedly want them for a time: because they thinke the selues so much more happie, how much more goods they haue where they shall tarie long. If we beleue that heauen is our country, it behoueth vs rather to send away our richesse lither than to keepe them here where we must lose them with sudden removing. But how shall we send them lither? If we communicate to the necessities of the poore to whome whatsoever is given, the Lorde accounteth it given to himselfe. Whereupon commeth that notable promise, Hee that giveth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lord. Againe, hee that liberally soweth, shall liberally reape. For those things are deliuered into the hande of the Lorde to keep, which are bestowed vpon our brethren by the dutie of charitable. He, as he is a faithful keeper of that which is deliuered to him, wil one day restore it with plentifull gaine. Are then our dutifull doings of so great value with God, that they be as richesse lade vp in store for vs in his hand? Who shall feare
The grace of Christ.

Lib. 3. 273

That notable oufties than affirmeth y clareth this. But as much as to encourage vs to well doing although the services which we do him are not worthy of so much as his only looking vpon them, yet he suffreth none of them to be lost.

7 But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when he comforteth the Thessalonians in troubles teacheth y the same are sent to them, that they may be accounted worthie of the kingdom of God, for which they suffer. For (faith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you, but to you, reft with vs when the Lord Iesus shalbe shewed from heauen. But the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues faith, God is not vnrighteous, that hee shoulde forget your worke, and the love which you have shewed in his name, for that you have ministrated to the saints. To the first place I answere, that there is no worthines spaken of: but because God the father willeth that we whome he hath chosen to be his children should be made like to Christ his first begotten sonne: as it behooved that he should first suffer, and then enter into the glorie appointed for him: so must we also by many tribulations enter into the kingdome of heauen. Therefore when we suffer tribulations for the name of Christ, there are as it were certaine marks printed vpó vs, wherewith God saith to make ye sheepe of his flocke. After this manner therefore wee are accounted worthie of the kingdome of God, because we beare in our body the marks of our Lord and master which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make these sayings. That we beare about in our body the mortification of Iesus Christ that his life may be shewed in vs. That we be fashioned like to his sufferings, that we may come to the likenes of his resurrection from the deade. The reason which is advoyned serveth not to procure any worthines, but to conforme the hope of the kingdome of God: as if he had said, As it agreeth with the just judgement of God, to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations they have done to you: so agreeth it also to give you releafe & rest from vexations. The other place, which teacheth it to become the righteousness of God not to forget the obediences of them that be his, that it declareth it to be in a manner vnrighteous if he should forget them; hath this meaning: God to quicken our slouthfulnes, hath given vs assurance that the labour that not be vaine which we shall take for his glorie. Let vs alway remember this promise, as all other should bring vs no profit, vnlesse the free covenant of mercie went before, wherupon the whole affylednes of our salvation should rest. But standing vpon that covenant, wee ought assuredly to trust there shall also not want reward of the liberallie of God to our works howsoever they be vnworthie. The Apostle to confirm vs in that expectatio affirmeth y God is not vnrighteous but will stand to his promise once made. Therefore this righteousness is rather referred to the truthe of gods promis, than to his justice of rending due. According to which meaning there is a notable sayning of Augustine, which as the holy man flickeith not to rehearse often as notable, so I thinke it not vnworthie that we shoulde continually re-
Cap. 18. Of the manner how to receive remember it. The Lord (faith he) is faithful, which hath made himselfe detter to vs, not by receiving any thing of vs, but by promising all things to vs.

8 There are also alledged these sayings of Paul. If I have all faith, so that I remoue mountains out of their place, but have not charitie, I am nothing.
Againe, Nowe there remaine hope, faith and charitie, but the greatest among these is charitie. Againe, Aboue all things haue charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharisces assume that we are rather justified by charitie than by faith, namely by the cheefe vertue, as they say But this fonde argument is easily wiped away. For we haue in another place alreadie declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place we also expounde of true faith, than which he faith that Charitie is greater not that it is more meritorious, but because it is more fruitful, because it extendeth further, because it remaineth in force, whereas the vs of faith continueth but for a time. If we haue regard to excellencie, the love of God should worthily have the chief place, of which Paul here speaketh not.
For he enforce this thing only, that we should with mutuall charitie edificie one another in the Lorde, but let vs imagine that charitie doeth every where excell faith: yet what man of sounde judgement, yea, or of sounde brainne, will gather thereof that it doeth more excell? The power of justifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthinesse of the worke. Our justification standeth vpon the onely mercie of God and the deservings of Christ, which justification when faith taketh holde of it, is faide to justifie.
Nowe if you ask your aduersaries in what sense they affigne justificacion to charitie, they will answeare that because it is a dutifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deservings thereof, righteousness is imputed to vs by the acceptation of the goodness of God. Here you see how well the argument procceded. We say that faith justifieth, not because by the wor-thinesse of it selfe it deserveth righteousness to vs, but because it is an instrument by which wee freely obtayne the righteousness of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, & passing ouer Christ, (where the summe of righteousness standeth) do affirme that we are justified by the benefite of charitie because it excelleth above faith: euén as if a man shoulde reason that a king is fitter to make a shooe then is a shoemaker, because hee is an infinite way more excellent. This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sorbonnial schooles doe not so much as taue with the vtermost part of their lippes what the justification of faith is. But if any wrangler doe yet carpe and aske, why in small distance of place wee take the name of faith in Paul to diuersely: I haue a weightie cause of this exposition. For ifth those giftes which Paul rehearseth are after a certaine manner vnder faith and hope, because they pertain to knowledge of god, he comprehended them all by way of recapitulation vnder the name of faith & hope: as if he should say both prophesie, and tongues, and the grace and knowledge of interpretation tende to this marke to lead vs to the knowledge of God. And wee know God in this life none otherwise but by hope & faith. Therefore when I name faith and hope, I comprehend all these thinges together. And so there
there remaine these three Hope, Faith, Charity: that is to say, how great diuersitie of gifts soever therebe, they are all referred to these. Among these the chief is charity, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charity be the bonde of perfection, then it is also the bonde of righteousness which is nothing else but perfection. First, to speake nothing how Paul calleth perfection, when the members of the Church well set in order do cleave together, and to grant that we are by charity made perfect before God: yet what new thing bring they sooth? For I will alwaie on the contrarie side take exception and say that we never come to this perfection vnlesse we fulfile the partes of charity, and thereupon I will gather, that first al men are most far from the fulfilling of charity, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9 I will not goe through al the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorbonistes rathyr snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hand, and do throw them against vs. For, some of them are so worthy to be laughed at, that I mysell also can not rehearse them vnlesse I would worthily be counted fonde. Therefore I will make an end, when I shall have declared the saying of Christ, wherewith they maruellously please themselues. For, to the lawyer which asked him what was necessarie to salvation, he aunswered: if thou wilt enter into life, keepe the commandementes. What would we more? (say they) when we are commanded by the author of grace himselfe to get the kingdom of God by the keeping of his commandementes? As though, forsooth it were not certain, that Christ tempered his answers to them with whom he was that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the law asketh of the meane to obtaine blessednesse, and not that only, but with doinge of what thing men may attaine unto it. Both the person of him that spake and the question it selfe led the Lord so to answer. The Lawyer being filled with the perswasion of the righteousness of the law, was blinde in confidence of workes. Againe, he sought nothing els but what were the workes of righteousness, by which saluation is gotten. Therefore he is worthy sent to the lawe, in which there is a perfect mirour of righteousness. We also do with a loude voyce pronounce that the commandementes must be kept, if life be sought in workes. And this doctrine is necessary to be knowne of Christiæs. For how should they flee to Christ if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the waye of life into the headlong downfal of death? But how should they understand how far they have strayed from the waie of life, vnlesse they first understande what is that waye of life? For then they are taught that the fantasuarie to recover saluation is in Christ, when they see howe great difference there is betwene their life and the righteousness of GOD which is contained in the keeping of the lawe. The summe is this, that if salvation be sought in workes, we must keepe the commandementes by which we are instructed to perfect righteousness. But we must not sticke fast here, vnlesse we will faint in our midde course: for none of vs is able to keep the commandementes. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteousnesse of the lawe, we must of necessitie refer to another helpe, namely to the faith of Christ. Wherefore as herethe Lorde calleth backe the doctour of the law whom he knew to swell with vaine confidence.
Cap. 18. Of the manner how to receive

of works, to the law, whereby he may learn that he is a sinner subject to the dreadful judgment of eternal death; so in other places, without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to me all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refresh you; and ye shall find rest for your souls.

10. At the last when they are weary with wrestling the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and sophistical argumentes. They caull upon this that faith is in some places called a work, and therupon they gather that we do wrongfully set faith as contrarie to works. As though offtheast faith in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her own deferving procure unto vs righteousness, & not rather because by embracing the mercy of God, it sealeth in our hearts the righteousness of Christ offered to vs of it in the preaching of the Gospel. The readers shall pardon me if I doe not tarry upon confusing of such follies, for they themselves without any fault of other, are sufficiently overthrown with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the waie confute one objection which seemeth to have some shew of reason, least it should trouble some that are not so well practised. Sith comon reason teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular sinnes are imputed to vs for vrightheousnesse, they say it is meete that to al particular good works be given the praise of righteousness. They do not satisfie me which answere, that the damnation of men properly proceedeth from onely vnbelief, not from particular sinnes. I do indeed agree to them, y vnbelief is the fountain and root of all euils. For it is the first departing from God, after which do follow the particular trespassings against the law. But whereas they seem to set one selfe same reason of good and euil works in wewing of righteousness or vrightheousnesse, therein I am compelled to disagree from them. For the righteousnesse of works is the perfect obedience of the law. Therefore thou canst not be righteous by works, vnlesse thou do follow it as a right line in the whole continual course of thy life. From it to soone as thou hast swerved, thou art fallen into vrightheousnesse. Hereby appeareth that righteousness commeth not of one or a few works, but of an vnswearing and vnwearied observing of the will of God. But the rule of judging vrightheousnesse is most contrary. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath stolé, is by one offence gilie of death, because he hath offended against the majestie of God. Therefore these our little arguers do stumble, for that they marke not this saying of James, that he which sinneth in one, is made gilie of all, because he that hath forbiddé to stalle, hath also forbidden to stalle, &c. Therefore it ought to semme no absurditie, when we saie that death is the just reward of every sin, because they are every one worthy of the just displeasure & vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather y by one good worke man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserueth his wrath.

The xix. Chapter.

Nowe we must entreat of Christian libertie: the declaration of he must not omitte whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgement. the summe of the doctrine of the Gospel. For it is a thing principally necessary, and without the knowledge whereof conscience dare in a maner enterprise nothing without doubting, they stumble and start backe in many things, they alway stagger and tremble: but specially it is an appendant of justification, & auaileth not a little to the understanding of the strengthe thereof. Yea they that earnestly fear God, shall hereby receive an incomparable fruite of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucianicall men doe pleasantly raute with their scoffes, because in the spiritual darkness wherewith they be taken, every wanton railing is lawfull for them. Wherefore it shal noe more forth in this season: and it was profitable to differre to this place the plaine discoursing of it, (for we haue alreadie in divers places lightly touched it) because tho as any mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either filthy lufls do Boyle, or mad motions doe rife, vnlesse these wanton raisiets be timely meet withal, which doe otherwise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For, some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and break forth into an vnbridled licentiousnesse: and some men disdain it, thinking that by it all moderation, order & choice of things is taken away. What shoulde we here doe, being compassed in such narrow straites? Shall we bidde Christian libertie farewell, and so cut off all frit occasion for such perils? But, as we haue saide, vnlesse that bee fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospel, nor the inward peace of the soule be rightly known. Rather we must endeavour that so necessarie a parte of doctrine be not suppressed, & yet that in the mean time those fond objectiones may be mette with all which are wont to rife thereupon.

2 Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three partes. The first, that the conueniences of the faithfull, when the assiance of their justification before God is to be sought, may raife and aduaunce themselves above the lawe, and forget the whole righteoufnesse of the lawe. For fith the lawe (as we haue alreadie in another place declared) leaueth no man righteous: either we are excluded from all hope of justification, or wee must bee loosed from the lawe, and so that there be no regard at all had of works. For whom thinketh that he must bring somewhat beit neuer so little of good works to obtaine righteoufnesse, he cannot appoint any ende or measure of them, but maketh himselfe better to the lawe. Therefore taking away all mention of the lawe, and laying aside all thinking upon worke, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when wee entreat of justification: and turning away our sight from our felues, wee must beholde Christ alone. For there the question is not howe we bee righteous: but howe although we bee vnrighteous and vnworthie, wee bee taken for worthie. Of which thing if conscience will attaine any certeintie, they must give no place to the lawe. Neither can any man hereby gather that the lawe is superfluous to the faithfull, whom it doeth not therefore cease to teach, and exhorte, and pricke forwarde to goodnesse, although before the judgement feare of GOD it hath noe place in their conscience. For these two things, as they are most desirous, so must they be well and diligently distinguished of vs. The whole life of Christians ought to bee a certaine meditation of godli-
Cap. 19. Of the maner how to receiue godlinesse, because they are called into sanctification. Herein standeth the office of the lawe, that by putting them in minde of their dutie, it shoule stirre them vp to the endeoure of holinesse and innocencie. But when con-sciences are carefull howe they may haue God mercifull, what they shal awnwere, and vpon what affiance they shall stande if they be called to his judgement, there is not to be reckned what the lawe requireth, but onely Christ must bee set forth for righteousnesse, which paseth all perfection of the lawe.

3 Vpon this point hangeth almost all the argument of the Epistle to the Galatians. For, that they bee fonde expiators which teach that Paul there contendeth onely for the libertie of ceremonies, may be propound by the places of the argumentes. Of which sort are these. That Christ was made a curse for vs, that hee might redeeme vs from the curse of the law, Againe, Stande saft in the libertie wherewith Christ hath made you fre, and bee not againe intangled with the yoke of bondage. Beholde, I Paul say, if yee be circumcised, Christ shal nothing profite you. And hee which is circumcised is better of the whole lawe. Christ is made idle to you whosoever yee bee that are justified by the lawe: yee are fallen away from grace. Wherein truely is contained some higher thing than the libertie of ceremonies. I graunt in deede that Paul there intretach of ceremonies, because hee contendeth with the fals Ephistles, which went about to bring agoine into the Christian Church the olde shadowes of lawe which were abolished by the comming of Christ. But for the discussing of this question, there were higher places to be disputed, in which the whole contro-versie stoode. First because by those Jewish shadowes the brightnesse of the Gospell was darkened, hee sheweth that wee haue in Christ a full giving in deede of all those thinges which were shadowed by the ceremonies of Moses. Secondly, because those deceivers filled the people with a moiste naughtie opinion, namely that this obedience asaile to deferre the favour of God: Here hee standeth much vpon this point, that the faithfull shoulde not thinkte that they can by any worke of the lawe, much leffe by those little principles, obteine righteoussesse before God. And therewithall hee teacheth, that they are by the crosse of Christ free from the damnation of the lawe, which otherwise hangeth ouer all men, that they shoulde with full asuredness rest in Christ alone. Which place properly pertaineth to this purpose. Last of all he maintaineth to the conuenciens of the faithfull their libertie, that they should not be bound with any religion in things not necessarie.

4 The seconde parte, which hangeth vppon that former parte, is that consciences obey the lawe, not as compelled by the necessitie of the lawe: but being free from the yoke of the lawe it selfe, of their owne accord they obey the will of God. For because they abide in perpetuall terrores, so long as they be under the dominion of the lawe, they shall never be with cheerful readinesse framed to the obedience of God, unleffe they first haue this libertie giuen them. By an example wee shall both more briefely, and more plainly perceiue what these thinges meane. The commandement of the lawe is, that we loue our God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all
all our strengths. That this may be done, our soule must first be made voide of all other sense and thought, our heart must be cleansed of all desires, all our strengths must be gathered vp and drawn together to this onely purpose. They which have gone most farre before other in the way of the Lord, are yet very farre from this marke. For though they love God with their minde, and with yncere affection of heart, yet they have stil a great part of their heart and soule possest with the desires of the flesh, by which they are drawn back and stayed from going forward with hasty course to God. They doe in deed travaile forward with great endeavours; but the flesh partly feeleth their strengths, and partly draweth them to it selfe. What shall they here do, when they feele that they do nothing lesse than perfome the lawe? They will, they couse, they endeavours, but nothing with such perfection as ought to be. If thou looke upon the lawe, they see that whatsoever worke they at empt or purpose, is accursed. Neither is there any cause why anie man should desire his selfe with gathering that the work is therefore not altogether evil, because it is vnperfect; and therefore that God doth neither lesse accept that good which is in it. For, the lawe requiring perfect love, condemneth all imperfection, vnlesse the rigour of it be mitigated. Therefore his worke should fall to nought which he would have to seeme partly good: and he shall finde that it is a transgression of the lawe, even in this because it is vnperfect.

5 Loe, howe all our workes are subject to the curse of the lawe, if they be measured by the rule of the lawe. But howe shoulde then unhappie soules cheerfully apply themselves to worke, for which they might not trust that they could get any thing but curse? On the other side, if being delivered from this seuer and exacting of the lawe, or rather from the whole rigor of the lawe, they heare that they be called of God with fatherly gentleness: they will merily and with great cheerfulnes anfwer his calling and follow his guiding. In a fume, they which are bound to the yoke of the lawe, are like to bond-merants, to whom are appointed by their Lordes certaine taske of worke for euerie daie. These servants thinke that they have done nothing, nor dare come into the sight of their Lordes, vnlesse they have performed that full taske of their worke. But children, which are more literally and more freemanlike handled of their fathers, stick not to present to them their begonne and halfe vnperfect worke, yea and those haveng some fault, trusting that they will accept their obedience and willingnesse of minde, although they have not exactly done so much as their good will was to do. So must we be as may have sure affiance, that our obediences shall be allowed of our most kinde father, how little soeuer, and how rude and vnperfect soeuer they be. As also he assureth to vs by the Prophet, I will spare them (faith he) as the father is wont to spare his sonne that serveth him. Where this worde Spare, is set for to beare wi hall, or gentely to winke at faultes, forasmuch as he also maketh mention of feruice. And this affiance is not a little necessary for vs, without which we shall goe about all things in vaine. For God accounteth himselfe to be worshipped with no worke of ours but which is truly done of vs for the worshipping of him. But howe can that be done among these terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worshipped with Men freed from the exactions of the lawe are as children sweetly vnwise unto cheerful obedience by the fatherly gentleness wherein they know that God hath promised to ex- cease them.

Mal.3.17.
Cap. 19. Of the manner how to receive without our works?

6 And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebræs, referreth all the good works that are read of in the holy fathers, to faith, and woceth them only by faith. Touching this liberty there is a place in the Epistle to the Romanes, where Paul reasoneth that sinne ought not to have dominion over vs, because we are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. For when he had exhorted the faithfull that sin should not reign in their mortal bodies, and that they should not give their members to be weapons of wickednesse to sin, but should dedicate themselves to God, as they are alive from the dead, & their members, weapons of righteousness to God: & whereas they might on the other side obiect that they do yet carry with them the flesh ful of lusts, and that sin dwelleth in them, he adiouneth that he fort by the liberty of the law, as if he should say. Though they doe not yet throughly feel sinne destroy'd & that righteousness yet liueth not in the, yet there is no cause why they should feare & be discouraged as though he had bin alway displeased with them for the remnants of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the law, that their works should not bee examined by the rule of the law. As for them that gather that we may sinne because we are not vnder the law, let them know that this liberty pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encourage vs to good.

7 The third part is, that we be bound with no confidence before God of outward things which are by themselves indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime use them, and sometime leave them vnused. And knowledge of this liberty also is very necessary for vs, for it shall be abten, there shall be no quiet to our consciences, no end of superstitions. Many at this day do think vs fond to move disputations about the free eating of flesh, about the free use of days, and garments, & such other small trifles as they in deede thinke them; but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when consciences have once cast themselves into the snare, they enter into a long and cumbersome way, from whence they can afterward finde no easie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether he may occupie linnen in sheetes, shirts, handkerchieues, and napkins, neither will he be out of doubt whether he may use hempe, and at the last he will also fall in doubt of matters, for he will wey with himselfe whether he cannot sup without napkins, whether he maye not be without handkerchieues. If any man thinke deintie meat to be vnlawfull, at length he shall not with quietnes before the Lorde eate either brownbread or common meates, when he remembret that he may yet sustaine his bodie with bafer foodes. If he doubt of pleasant wine, afterward he will not drinke dead wine with good peace of conscience, lest of all he will not be bold to touch sweeter and cleaner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it vnlawfull (as the common sayings is) to tread upon a straw lying a croffe. For here is begonne no light strife, but this is in question, whether GOD will have vs to use these or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsell and doings. Hereby some must needs be carried with desperation into a confess deuouring pitte: some must, despisig GOD, and casting away his feare, make themselves away through de.

destruction when they have no ready way: For whosoever are entangled with such doubting, which way soever they turne them selues, they see every where present offence of conscience.

8 I knowe faith Paul) that nothing is common (meaning by common, unholy) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which words he maketh all outward thinges subject to our liberty, prouing alway that our mindes haue the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into vs any doubt, those thinges which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to vs. Wherefore he addeth : bles ded is he that judgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if he eat, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrowe straites, who so neatly thelese with carelesly venturing on all thinges thew themselves boulders, do they not as much turn themselves away from God? But they which are through-lie pereed with some feare of God, when they themselfes also are compelled to doe many thinges against their conscience, are discouraged and doe fall downe with feare. All that are such, do receive none of the gifts of God with thanksgiving, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our vs: I mean the thanksgiving that proceedeth from a hart that acknowledge the liberalitie and goodness of God in his gifts. For many of them in deede do understand that those are the benefites of God which they vs, and they praise God in his works: but thith they are not persuaded that they are given to themselfes, how should they thanke God as the giver of them? Thus in a summe we see, where this libertie tendeth, namely that we should vs the gifts of God to such vs as he hath giuen them vnto vs, with out any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of mind, by which confidence our soules may both haue peace with him, and acknowledge his liberalitie towarde vs. For here are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be observed, that our consciences should not be bound with any necessitie to keepe them, but should remember that the vs of them is by Gods benefite subject to themselves vnto edification.

9 But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spirittual thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing fearefull consciences before God, if either they be unquieted, or carefull for the forgivencesse of sinnes, or if they be pesuade whether our imperfect works and defiled with the faultes of our flesh doe please God, or if they bee troubled about the vs of indifferent thinges. Wherefore they doe wrongfully expounde it, which either doe make a close for their owne desires, that they may abuse the gifts of God to their owne lust, or which do thinke that there is no liberty but that which is vsed before men, and therefore in vsing it have no regardes of the weake brethren. In the first kind, men doe at this day much offend. There is almoast no man which may by his abilitie of wealth be supruous, which delighteth not in excesseful gorgiousnes, in furniture of banketes, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kind of statelynesse: which doth not maruellously flatter himselfe in his finenes. And all these thinges are defended vnder the pretence of Christian libertie. They say that they are thinges indifferent.
Cap. 19. Of the maner how to receiue

I grants, so that a man indifferently use them. But when they are too greedily coveted, when they are prouudely boasfted, when they are waftfulliy spent, it is certayne that those thinges which otherwise were of themselves lawfull, are by these faultes defiled. This saying of Paul doth very well put difference between those thinges indifferent: All thinges are clean to the cleane: but to the defiled and vnbeleeuing, nothing is clean, because their minde and conscience is defiled. For why are accused the rich men, they which hauie their comfor, which are satisfied with meat, which doe nowe laugh, which sleepe in beds of iuorie, which ioyne land to land, whose bankets haue Lute, Harpe, taber and wine: Verily both iuorie, and golde, and riches, are the good creatures of God, permitted yea and appointed by the providence of God for men to use. Neither is it anywhere forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfiled with meate, or to ioyne new possesions to their owne old possesions or of their auncestors, or to be deliuered with musickall melodie, or to drink wine.
This is true indeede. But when they have plentie of thinges, to wallowe in delights, to gloue themselves, to make their wit and mind drunk with present pleasures & alway to gape for new, these doings are most far from the lawful use of the gifts of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wafting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely use the gifts of God, When the minde shall be framed to this sobrietie, they shall have a rule of the lawfull use. On the other side let this moderation bee wanting, even basse and common delicaties are too much. For this is trulie saide, that oftentimes in mist and course cloth dwellth a purple heart, and sometime under silk and purple, lieth simple humilitie. Let curie men in his degree so live either poorelie, or meanlie, or plentifullie, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: & let them thinke, that this is the law of Christian libertie: if they have learned with Paul to be contented with those thinges which they presently have: if they can skill both to bee humble and to excell: if they be taught in all places and in all thinges to bee both full and hungrie, to haue plentie and to suffer want.

10 Hearrein also many men doe erre, because as though their libertie should not be found and safe vnlesse it had men witnessies of it, they doe vndifferentlie and vnwise lie use it. By which vnseasonable using they many times ofoffende the weake brethren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their libertie cannot stannde, vnlesse they take possession of it by eating of fleth on friday. I blame not that they eate: but this false opinion must be driven out of their minde. For they ought to thinke that by their libertie they obtain no newe thing in the sight of men but before GOD, and that it standeth as well in abstaining as in using. If they understand that it maketh no matter before GOD, whether they eate flesh or eggs, whether they were red or black garments, that is enough. The conscience is nowe free, to which the benefite of such libertie was due. Therefore although they doe afterwarde abstaine all their life long from flesh, and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience abstaine. But they do most hurtfullie offende because they nothing regard the weaknesses of their brethren, which we ought so to beare with, that we rashly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime alfo it behooveth that our libertie be let forth before men. And this I graunt. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake whome the Lord hath so earnestly giuen vs charge.

11 I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what dif-ferenee they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be ne-eglected. whereupon wee may afterwarde determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that common diuision, which teacheth there is of offences one sort giuen, another taken: for as much as it both hath a plaine testimonie of the Scripture, and doth not vnfitly express it which it meaneth. If thou do any thing by vnseasonable lighntenesse, or wantonnes, or rashnesse, nor in order, nor in fit place, whereby the ignorant & weake are offended, that same may be called an offence giuen by thee: because it came to passe by thy fault that such offence was stirred vp. And it is always called an offence giuen in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not euill done nor out of time is by euill will or by one wrongfull maliciousnesse of minde drawn to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence giuen, but these wrongfull confutteris doe without cause take one.
With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weake: but with this second kind of souere naturcs & Pharisaicall scornfull heads are offended.
Wherefore we shall call the one, the offence of the weake: the other of the Pharisees: and we shall so temper the use of our libertie, that it ought to giue place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigorousenesse of the Pharisees. For, what is to be yielded to weakenesse, Paul sheweth in very many places. Bare (faith he) the weake in faith. Againe, Let vs not hereafter judge one another: but this rather, let there not be laide before our brother any offence or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to y same enter, which are more fit to be read in the place it self, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong should beare with the weakenes of our brethren, and not please our selues: but euery one of vs please his neighbour unto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie be not in any wise an offence to them that are weake. Againe, Eate ye all things, that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience: of your conscience (I say) not another mans. Finally be ye such, that ye giue no offence, neither to the Jewes, nor to the Greeks, nor to the Church of GOD. Also in another place, Ye are called, brethren, into libertie: onely giue not your libertie to be an occasion to the flth, but by charitie serue ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not giuen toward our weake neighbours, whose seruantes charitie maketh vs in all things: but rather, that having peace with God in our mindes, wee may alfo live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharisees, how much it is to be regarded, wee learne by the wordes of the Lorde, whereby he bid doth them to be let alone, because they are blind, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them, not to be cared for.

12 But yet still the matter hangeth doutfull, vnlesse wee knowe who are to be taken for weake, and who for Pharisees: which difference being taken away, I see not among offences what ye at all of libertie remaineth, which might never be vsed without great danger. But it seemeth to me that Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to bee tempered or to bee defended though with offences. When he tooke Timothee into his companie, hee circumcised him: but hee could not be brought to circumcise Titus. Here were diuerse doings, and no change of purpoe or of mind: namely in circumcising Timothee, when hee was free from all men, hee made himselfe a servant to all men: and hee was made to the Iewes, as a Iewe, that hee might winne the Iewes: to them that were vnder the lawe, as if he himselfe were vnder the lawe, that hee might winne them which were vnder the lawe: all things to all men, that he might saue many, as he writeth in another place. Thus wee haue a right moderation of libertie, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What he had respect vnto, when he stoutly refused to circumcise Titus, hee himselfe testifyth, writing thus: But neither was Titus, which was with me, altho\n ough he was a Greetian compelled to be circumcised, because of the faile brethren which were come in by the way, which had priuily crept in to espie our libertie which we haue in Christ Iesus, that they might bring vs into bondage, to whom we gaue not place by subjection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when we must of necessity defend our libertie, if the same be in weake consciences endangered by the vnjust exadings of faile Apostles. We must in every thing studie to preserue charitie, and haue regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (faith he) are lawfull for me, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things doe not edifie. Let no man secke that which is his owne, but which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that we must vse our libertie, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbour: but if it be not so expedient for our neighbour, then we must forbear it. There be some which counterfeit the wisedome of Paul in forbearing of libertie, while they do nothing lesse than apply the same to the duties of charitie. For so that they may provide for their owne quietnes, they with all mention of libertie to be buried, whereas it is no lesse behouefull for our neighbours, sometime to vse libertie for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to restrain it for their commodity. But it is the part of a godly man to think, that free power in outward things is therefore granted him, that he may bee the freer to all duties of charitie.

13 But whatsoever I haue spoken of avoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For those things that are necesarie to be done, are not to be lefte vndone for feare of any offence. For as our libertie is to be submitted to charitie, so charitie is to be submitted to our libertie. do nothing but with troublesome turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to rende all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkned to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand sorts of vngodlines, yet do, sain that they must behaue them selves so that they be none offence to their neighbors. As though they doe not in the mean ende if the consciences of their neighbours to euill, specially whereas they sticke fast in the same vice without anie hope of getting out. And the pleasant men forsooth, whether their neighbor be to be instructed with doctrine or exaile of life, say that he must be fed with milk, whom they fill with most euil & poionous opinions. Paul reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Maffe had then bene among them, would he have sacrificed to give them the drink of milke? No: For milk is not poison. Therefore they lie in saying that they feede them whom vnder a shew of flattering allurements they cruely kill. But granting that such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet wil they feede their children with milke: For if they never growe bigger, that they may at the least bee able to bare some light meat, it is certain that they were never brought vp with milke. Ther are two reasons that moose me why I do not now more sharply contend with them: first, because their follies are scarcelie worthie to bee confuted, sith they worthilie seeme filthie in the sight of all men that haue their sounde wit secondlie, because I haue sufficentlie done it in peculiar bookes, I will not now se a thing alreadie done, One lie let the readers remember this, that with whatsoeuer offences Satan & the worlde go about to turne vs away from the ordinances of God, or to stay vs from following that which he appointeth, yet wee must neuertheless go earnestly forward: and then, that whatsoeuer dangers hang vpon it, yet is it not at our libertie to swithe one hate bredth from the commandement of the same God, neither is it lawfull by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giueth vs leave.

Now therefore sith faithful consciences haue received such prorogative of libertie as we haue aboue set forth, haue by the benefit of Christ obtained this that they be not entangled with anie snares of obseruation in those things in which the Lord willed that they should be at libertie: we conclude that they are exempt from al power of men. For it is annecte, that whether Christ should lose the thank of his so great liberalitie, or consciences their profite. Neither ought we to think it a light matter, which we see to haue cost Christ so deere: namelie which he valued not with gold or silver, but with his owne bloud: so that Paulsticketh not to say, that his death is made void, if we yeeld our soules into subjection to men. For he traveleth about nothing els in certaine chapters of the epistle to the Galatians, but to sain that Christ is darkned or rather destroied to vs, yelde our consciences stande fast in their libertie, which verily they haue lost if they may at the will of men be snared with the bondes of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthy to be knowne, so it needeth a longer & plainer declaration. For soone as any word is spoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by and by great troubles are raised vp partlie by feditious men, partlie by slanderers; as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and overthrown.
Therefore that none of vs may stumble at this stone, first let vs consider, that there are two sorts of government in man: the one spiritual whereby the conscience is framed to godliness and to the worship of God: the other civil, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanitie and ciuitality which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not vnit names called the Spiritual and Temporall jurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of these two formes of government pertaineth to the life of the soule, and the latter is occupied in the thinges of this present life: not enely in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spende his life among men holielie, honestly, and soberlie. For, that first kinde hath place in the inwarde minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behaviours. The one we may call the Spiritual kingdom, the other, the Civil kingdom. But these two, as we have diuided them, must bee either of them always severally considered by themselues, and when the one is in considering, we must withdrawe and turne away our mindes from the thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two worldes, which both divers kings and divers lawes may governe. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spiritual libertie, wee shall not wrongfully drawe to the ciuill order, as though Christians were according to the outward government lesse subject to the lawes of men, because their consciences are at libertie before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Again, because even in those ordinances which seem to pertaine to the spiritual kingdom, there may be some error, we must also put difference betweene these, which are to be taken for lawfull as agreeable to the word of God, & on the other side which ought not to have place among the godly. Of the Civil government there shall be else where place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiastical lawes I omit to speak at this time, because a more full entreaty of it shall bee fitte for the fourth booke, where we shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discoursse, let this be the conclusion. The question being (as I haue sayde) of it selfe not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accomber many, because they do not sufficiently enough put difference betweene the outward court as they call it, & the court of conscience. Moreover this encreaseth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not only for fear of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bound by the ciuill lawes, if it were so, all should come to naught which wee both haue spoken and shall speake of the spirituall government. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to knowe what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to be fetched from the derivation of the worde. For, as when men do with minde and understanding conceiue the knowledge of thinges, they are thereby saide (Scire) to knowe, whereupon also is derived the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they have a feeling of the judgement of God, as a witness joinnyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their finnes but that they be drawne accused to the judgement scare of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man, because it suffereth not man to supprese in himselfe y which hee he knoweth but pursueth him so farre tis to bring him to guiltines. This is it which Paul meaneth, where he saith that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughts do accuse or acquite them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man. Therefore this telling which pretendeth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keeper ioned to man, to marke and espie all his secrets, that nothing may remaine buried in darkness. Whereupon also commeth that olde Proverbe, Conscience is a thousand witnesses. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for quietness of mind, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ, wee doe without feare present our fulues before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, setteth to have no more conscience of sinne, in stead of, to be delivered or acquited that sinne may no more accuse vs.

16 Therefore as works have respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is nothing els but the inward purenes of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charitie is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not sained. Afterward also in the same chapter he sheweth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwracke from the faith, because they had forsaken good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth it is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere endeuer to live holy and godly. Sometime in deed it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endeavoured himself to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore saide, because the fruities of good conscience do flow and come even to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God only, as I haue already said. Hereby it commeth to passe that the law is said to binde the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of me, or without having any consideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not onely to keepe the mindes chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbidden al manner of filthine of wordes and outward wantonnesse whatsoever it be. To the keeping of this lawe my conscience is subject although there liued not one man in the world. So he that behaueth himselfe intemperately, not onely finneth in this that he giveth an euil example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bounde with guiltines before God. In things that are of themselves meane, there is another consideration. For we ought to abstaine from them if they breed any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consecrate to Idols. If any (faith hee) moue any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned should nevertheless eat such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it is necessarie for him to abstaine as it is prescribed of God, yet hee ceaseth not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Thus wee see how this lawe binding the outward worke, leaueth the conscience vnbounde.

The xx. Chapter.

Of Prayer, which is the cheefe exercise of faith, & by wherev wee daily receive the benefites of God.
Of these things that have beene hitherto spoken, wee plainly perceiue how needy and voide man is of all good things, and how he wanteth all helpe of saluation. Wherefore if hee seeketh for releaues whereby hee may succour his neediness, hee must goe out of him selfe and get them else where. This is afterward declared vnto vs, that the Lorde doth of his owne free wil and liberally giue him selues to vs in his Christ, in whom hee offereth vs in steede of our miseries all felicities, in steede of our neede wealth, in whom hee openeth vs to the heavenly treasures: that our whole faith should behold his beloved sonne, that vpon him our whole expectation should hang, in him our whole hope should stick and rest. This verily is the secret and hidden Philosophie, which cannot be wrung out with Logicall arguments: but they learne it whome eyes God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that we are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatsoeuer we have neede of, whatsoeuer wanteth in vs, the same is in God and in our Lorde Jesus Christ, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulnesse of his largest to rest, that from thence we should all drawe as out of a most plentiful fountain: now it remaineth that wee seek him, and with prayers craue of him that which we have learned to be in him. Otherwise to knowe God to be the Lorde and giver of all good things, which allureth vs to pray to him, and not to goe to him and pray to him: should so nothing profit vs, that it should be all one as if a man shoulde neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle, to shewe that true faith cannot be idle from calling vpon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospel springeth faith, so by it our hearts are framed to call vpon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a little before saied, that the Spirit of adoption, which sealeth in our hearts the witnesses of the Gospel, saith vp our spirites that they dare shewe forth their desires to God, and receueth vp vnipeakable gronings, & cry with confidence Abba Father. It is meete therefore that this last point, because it was before but onely spoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, shoulde nowe bee more largely entreated of.

2. This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that wee attaine to those riches which are laid vp for vs with the heauenlie father. For there is a certaine communicating of me with God, whereby they entring into the sanctuarie of heauen, do in his owne presence call to him touching his promises: that the same thing which they beleued him affirming onely in word not to be vaine, they may when neede do requireth finde in experience. Therefore we see that there is nothing set forth to vs to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which we are not also commanded to craue with prayers: so true it is that by prayer are digged vp the treausures, which our faith hath looked vp being shewed to us by the gospell of the Lord. Now how necessarie and how manie waies profitable this exercise of prayer is, it can by no words be sufficientlie declared. Undoubtedly it is not without cause the heauenly father testifieth, that the only fortres of saluation is in the calling vpon his name, namely whereby vve call to vs the presence both of his providence, by which he watcheth to take care of our matters; and of his power, by which he susteineth vs being weake and in a manner fainting; and of his goodnes, by by which he receiueth vs into fauour being miserably loaden with sinnes: finally whereby we call him all whole, to giue himselfe present to vs. Heredy growth singular rest and quietnesse to our conferences. For when we have disclosed to the Lorde the necessitie which distressed vs, wee largely rest though it were but in this onely that none of our evils is hidden from him, whom we are perswaded both to be most wel willing toward vs, and most able to provide wel for vs.

3 But (wil some man say) did not he know without any to put him in mind of it, both in what part we be distressed, and what is expedient for vs? so that it may seeme after a certaine manner superfluous, that he should be troubled with our prayers, as though he winked or slept, vntill he were awaked with our voice? But they which to reason, maketh not to what ende the Lorde hath instrueted them that he is to pray: for he ordained it not so much for his owne caufe as rather for ours. He willeth in deed, as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatso- ever men require or doe perceiue to make for their profite, and doe confess the same with willinges. But the profite also of this sacrifice wherewith hee is worshipped, commeth to vs. Therefore howe much more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselues and other of the benefites of GOD, so much the more sharply they were pricked forwarde to pray. The onely example of Elias shall bee enough for vs, which being sure of the counsell of God, after that hee not rathly had promised raine to Ahab, yet boldly prayeth betwene his knees, and sendeth his servaunt seven times to espie it: not for that hee did discredit the oracle of God, but because he knewe that it was his dutie, left his faith should waxe drowsie and sluggishe, to lay vp his desires with God. Wherefore altho' whlie wee lie fentiifhe and so dull that wee perceiue nor our owne miseries, bee wake & watcheth for vs, and sometime also helps and vs vndesire, yet it much beho- ueth vs, that hee be continually called vpon of vs, that our heart may be enflamed with earnest & fervent desire to seeke, love, & worship him, while we accustome our selues in many necessitie to flee to him as to our doore an- chare. Againe, that no desire & no wish at al may enter into our mind, whereof we should be ashamed to make him witnesse, while wee learne to present our wishes, yea & to poure out our whole heart before his eyes. Then we may be framed to receiue all his benefites with true thankfulness of mind, yea & with outward thanksgiving, of which wee are put in minde by our prayer they come to vs from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which we desired, being persuaded that he hath answered to our prayers, we may be therby the more frequently caried to think vpon his kindnes, & ther- withal embracce with greater pleasure those things which we acknowledge to haue ben obtained by prayer. Last of al, that vertue & experience may according to the meaure of our weaknesses affure our minds of his prouidence when we understand that he not onely promiset hym that he will never faile vs, & that he doth of his own accord open vs the entrie to cal to him in the vertie point of necessitie, but also hath his hande alway stretched out to helpe them that be his, & that he doth not feede them with words, but defendeth them with present help. For these causes, the most kinde Father, although he never sleepeth or is sluggisht, yet oftentimes maketh a shew as though hee slept and were sluggisht, that so hee may excersice vs, which are otherwise slouthfull and sluggisht to come to him, to ask of him, to require him to our owne great benefit. Therefore they do so foolishly, which to call away the minde of men from prayer, babble that the providence of GOD, which maketh for the safekeeping of all things, is in vaine wearest with our callings vpon him: Whereas the Lorde contrariwise not in vaine testifieth that he is nigh to all them that call vpon his name in the truthe. And of none other forte is that which other doe tritlingly say, that it is superfluous to aske those things which the Lorde is of his owne will readie to give, whereas even the very same things which flowe to vs from his owne free liberality, hee will haue vs acknowledge to bee granted to our prayers. Which thing that notable sentence of the Psalme doeth testifie, wherewith many like sayings doe accorde. The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his cares vnto their prayers. Which saying doe setteth out the providence of God bent of his owne accord to prouide for the safety of the godly, that yet he omitteth not the exercis of faith, whereby slouthfulness is wiped from the minde of men. The eyes of God therefore doe walke, that hee may succour the necessitie of the blinde: but hee will againe on our behalves heare our gronings, that he may the better proue his loue toward vs. And so both are true, that the watchman of Israel sleepeh not, nor slumbereth, and yet that he setteth stil as having forgotten vs when hee sleeeth vs dull and dumme.

Psal. 1.21.8. The first rule of framing rightly our prayers is to avoid our cogitation as much as may be from all fleshly or carthly cares.

Psal. 145.18. Nowe, to frame prayer rightly and well, let this bee the first rule, that we be no otherwise framed in minde and heart, than becommeth them that enter into takle with God. Which veriety wee shall attaine as touching the minde, if the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughtes wherein it may bee called away or withdrawn from the right and pure beholding of God, doe not onely bend it selfe wholly to prayer but also so much as is possible be lifted vp and carried above it selfe. Neither doe I here require a mind so at libertie, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the frequenctesse of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in vs, (as we see that the holy servants of God doe sometime declare great tormentes, much more carefulneses, when they say they vnter to the Lord a bewailing voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the middest of the iawes of death.) But I say that all strange and foreigne cares must be druen away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring hither and thither is carried about, and being drawn out of heaven is pressed downe to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted vp above it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those things which our blinde and foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may holde it selfe bound within the compass of her owne vanitie, but riseth vp to purenes worthie for God.

The preparation of the minde vnlesse prayer is a thing of great both weights and difficult -
